In December 1942, Dan Edelman joined the 100th Infantry Division in Fort Jackson, South Carolina. Assigned to The Army Specialized Training Program as a public relation specialist, his training included language, psychological warfare, and propaganda—the history and application. “There’s a picture on the wall in our Edelman Museum showing me at the typewriter during a field exercise with a tent in the background and a little sign on the table reading “Public Relations.” I didn’t know it then, but that was the first step in my future career.”

In August of 1944, Dan’s assignment came to join the 5th Mobile Broadcast Unit. During this time he traveled throughout writing a nightly analysis of German propaganda, his team would listen to German Radio and read ticker day and night and translate the hundreds of pages which Dan would consolidate into a six-page analysis.

After the nearby “Battle of the Bulge,” Dan crossed the Rhine and worked in Bad Humburg until he was commissioned to Berlin where his Unit (Psychological Warfare) changed to the Information Control Division. In 1945 Dan and his unit became responsible for the control and restructuring of the German press, radio, theater, and film. To begin rebuilding German media Dan helped develop and conduct opinion research surveys on the German people and former press members.

Perhaps one of the most impressionable and incredible assignments in Dan’s service was during the Nuremberg Trials. Before the trials began, lawyers for the defense began to gather their witnesses. Dan conducted profiles on the individuals detailing their whereabouts during the Nazi regime. Dan was present during some of the trials and assisted in conducting public opinion research on the German people’s reactions to the trial. After completing his work as a reports officer in Berlin Dan returned to the United States in the Spring of 1946.

“I must tell you it was one of the great breaks in my life that I was able to serve as a Private in the U.S. Army” — Dan Edelman

YANKS 37 MILES FROM PARIS

The allied columns now are converging on Paris, American forces are racing northwest, and are reported by the Germans 37 miles from the French capital. The Canadians are moving on Paris from around Falaise.

Russians Open New Drive

Soviet—new powerful Russian offensive was opened yesterday along a 100-mile front northeast of Moscow. The spearhead of the offensive has already advanced to within 15 miles of East Prussia. In the north, the Soviet communique stated, Russian troops advanced 16 miles on a 40-mile front west of Lake Peipus in Estonia.

It was also reported that German General Walter von Seydlitz, chairman of the Free German Committee, has told German troops in Estonia that continued fighting is useless.

President Tells Nation of Trip to Pacific

PUGET SOUND, Wash.—President Roosevelt broadcast to the nation last night a report of his visit to Hawaii, the Alabans, and Alaska. He spoke from the Naval vessel that had taken him on his inspection tour of American forces in the Pacific.

Accompanied by his Chief of Staff, Admiral Leahy, the President conferred at Pearl Harbor with General MacArthur, Admiral Nimitz, and General Richardson, commander of the Hawaiian area. He reported "perfect agreement among all commanders as to future operations in the Pacific.

The President said the war would be over sooner if the Germans, report gains by American troops.

London—The German news agency DNB announced last night that American troops are 37 miles from Paris.

Supreme Allied Headquarters in Normandy stated that the Americans have crossed the Loire River 60 miles southeast of the French capital. Further north, at Falaise, Canadian forces were reported on the move toward Paris.

General Montgomery declared yesterday that the main aim of the Allied armies is the destruction of the German armies in France, rather than the early capture of Paris. The greater part of German troops in northern France now is facing destruction, said the General.

Your Transport Commander:

I want to welcome all military personnel aboard the U.S. Army Transport. Since I am not able to get each of you personally, I want to do so through the "Rail Call".

There is just one thing I would like to stress now that we are under way. We are in an actual theatre of war. The enemy is very real in these waters.

For your own good, forget once and for all the atmosphere of the training camps back in the States. We, all the enemy, are playing for keeps, and the enemy is in a desperate position.

Listen carefully to all orders; obey them promptly. Your life may depend upon your actions.
FLORENCE FALLS

ITALIANS CHEER
LIBERATING ALLIES

ROME—Allied Headquarters in Italy announced yesterday Florence has been liberated by the Allied Forces. German troops evacuated the key north Italian city under cover of darkness Friday night, and the Allies entered immediately afterward.

Although the city was still littered with wounds after weeks of concentrated artillery shelling and air attack, the people cheered as the allied troops passed through the streets. Parts of Florence were still burning, but officials of the Allied Military Government said damage to the famous art center was not as extensive as they had feared.

Prime Minister Churchill has arrived in Rome. Observers believe he may be considering with the new Italian government or discussing plans with Allied military leaders for a new invasion in southern France.

LUXURY LINER NOW CARRIES TROOPS

Once a luxury liner that boasted two swimming pools, a huge dance floor, and a well-stocked bar, the U. S. Army Transport has, since Pearl Harbor, carried tens of thousands of troops into theatres of operations.

Commissioned in the Transport Service three years ago, the S. S. has been in continuous operation in every port of the globe. All her voyages have been made under Captain Albert P. Spaulding, Master of the ship, and senior captain of the Moore-McCormack Line.

The , formerly the , was built in 1929 at Newport News, Va. and for many years was used for cruises between New York and California. After being overhauled and rechristened in 1938, the vessel traveled regularly to New Orleans, New York City, and Montevideo.

Soldiers or Sailors—?

If you've turned and stared at the "sailors" with Army chevrons, you'll be interested to know that the men sporting blue donkeys and sailor hats aren't Navy at all, but Army G.I.'s. Reason for the unique uniform is that these men are members of a harbor craft company of the Transportation Corps, closest thing in the Army to actual naval work.

The mission of the combination "soldier-sailors" is to move military personnel and cargo in harbors, rivers, and islands. In contrast with the Navy and Coast Guard, however, they are usually employed for short range movement within the theatre of operations.

"In order to carry out our functions, we are equipped with a fleet of small cargo vessels, troop ferries, tug boats and barges," explained Captain Earl H. Hansen, commanding officer of the unit. "We operate these vessels and also have maintenance crews to keep them in trim."

RUSSIANS ADVANCE ON THREE FRONTS

AMERICANS DRIVE FOR ENCLERCIMENT OF GERMAN 7TH ARMY

LONDON—At least 20 divisions of the Seventh German Army which have been holding up the British-Canadian advance in the Normandy sector face complete encirclement as a result of a new American offensive north of La Manche.

American troops are racing northward to join the British-Canadian forces and thereby to effect a pincers around the German center of resistance.

Contact between the Americans and British is expected soon at Vire.

South of Yante, American troops are pushing toward the submarine base at La Rochelle and the port of Bordeaux, after crossing the Loire River.

The German garrisons at Brest, Lorient and St. Nazaire continued to hold out against heavy American attacks.

Secrecy shrouded the large-scale Yank tank and infantry movements farther inland, which are aimed at Paris. The Americans in this sector were believed to be near Chartres, 46 miles south east of the capital, and at Chartres, 26 miles farther south.

SOVIET ARMIES CROSS POLISH VISTULA, GAIN IN BALTIC

MOSCOW—Powerful Soviet forces are advancing along the entire Eastern front, and have liberated more than 600 towns and villages in their new offensive, the Soviet High Command announced yesterday.

The Russians scored their greatest success northeast of Warsaw, (see map, arrow 1) where the Second White Russian Army pushed across the Polish Bug River.

In Latvia and Estonia, Red Army tanks and infantry continued to hit deep into the German flank west of Lake Peipus (arrow 2) in an effort to destroy an estimated 300,000 German troops trapped against the Baltic Sea. The Second Baltic Army announced that 60,000 German troops have been killed during the past month.

Another Russian column is advancing northeast of Riga toward the Gulf of Riga (arrow 3) in an attempt to create another pocket.

Relations continued to be strained between the Polish Government-in-Exile and the Soviet Union. Thus, Soviet News Agency, declared that the underground insurrection in Warsaw was begun prematurely without Soviet cognizance.

ALLIED BOMBERS HIT GERMANY

LONDON—The Air Ministry announced yesterday that a fleet of Allied bombers crossed the Channel Saturday to attack railway yards at Metz and military objectives in Brunswick, Kiel and Rendselshohm, where 13,600 tons of bombs were dropped.
Well, Mom, I never dreamed I'd be going on a long ocean voyage. In fact, I still can't believe it. I just like to stand at the rail of the ship and look at the water and the other ships in the convoy.

All in all, this has been quite a vacation. Really there's hardly anything G.I. about it. We just sit around on the deck most of the day, playing cards, smoking, and bulling with our friends. Of course, we had guard duty last night, but it was only for a few hours and I didn't mind it at all. I've been getting as much fresh air as possible during the days, because at night we have to close up our port holes on account of the blackout. That makes it pretty hot in the ship, and it's not easy to fall asleep. But I guess it's worth a little inconvenience if it means not giving away our position to enemy submarines.

You probably thought that I'd spend most of the trip at the rail giving up all my food. Actually, I haven't been seasick yet at all, though I must admit there were some moments yesterday when I began to get that dizzy feeling. They tell us we're traveling in the best month of the year as far as seasickness is concerned. The water is really calm, and the days quite warm. This morning was the first time I've seen real whitecaps.

Incidentally, I met the Muller boy on the ship. You remember him, Bill Muller, from Elm Street. We went to high school together, and I hadn't seen him for about four years. He's with some other outfit coming over, and has a sergeant's rating. Pretty good. He's quite a nice guy and we've had a lot of fun talking about old times.

You'll be glad to know that I went to services this morning. It was quite impressive, conducted by the ship's chaplain in the open air. There'll be a movie for us tonight too, and they also have a ship's orchestra and a variety show once in a while. So you see we're pretty well taken care of.

Well, I guess I've written more than enough. I hope you all keep well, and that you don't worry about me or miss me too much. I'm sure I'll be O.K. I really feel much better now that I know I'm going to play a real part in winning the war, and before you know it I'll be home again. All my love now,

Jim

Twenty divisions facing trap in France—Gen. Eisenhower calls for death blow

London—Thousands of German troops were but twenty miles from the British last night in the area Canadians south of Falaise, when the twenty-mile area was being used last night by approximately twenty German Seventh Army divisions in a last attempt to escape from the rapidly joining Allied forces.

The roads to Paris were choked with German troops and vehicles heading a last retreat. More than 2000 Allied bombers pounded the fleeing Germans mercilessly with such fury that prisoners were quoted by Allied intelligence officers as saying it was "inhuman." General Eisenhower appealed to his troops to take full opportunity of dealing a death blow to a faltering enemy. "The enemy can survive only by surrendering," he said. "Let no foot of ground be retaken. Let no enemy soldier escape.

Chinese forces were striking to recapture Hengyang from the Japanese yesterday, as the tempo of fighting increased around the Canton-Hankow railroad city.

Prime Minister Churchill conferred with Marshall Tito and Dr. Subotic, Yugoslav Prime Minister, in Italy yesterday over problems of Yugoslav unity.

Supreme Allied High Command announced last night for the first time that the Third Army was in action in Normandy.

Russians stem Counter-Attack

MOSCOW—A heavy German counter-attack in the Warsaw region has been repulsed by the Soviet armies, the Russian High Command announced last night.

The Nazi blow failed to stop the progress of the Second White Russian Army which pushed across the Polish Bug River on Sunday in a drive which appears aimed at last Krauchen. While this army stood at a point 13 miles from the East Russian border, another massive Soviet army farther north advanced to within thirty miles of the easternmost German territory.

Five hundred soldiers of a German SS division were reported killed in the Warsaw sector action.

On the other bank of the Bug River, General Sokolovsky's army took positions nine miles north of Warsaw.

In the north, General Andrei Yeremenko's Second Baltic Army captured the high road and rail center of Mazurka, 75 miles east of the city of Riga in Latvia.

The Third Baltic Army under General Ivan Munichsky, moving west from Lake Peips, through Estonia, rolled through 20 villages to take positions 95 miles from the Gulf of Riga.

The twin Baltic drives in Estonia and Latvia had as their objective the destruction of 25 German divisions trapped in the north.

Allied Bombers Hit
Italian Riviera

London—Allied bombers pounded objectives in Southern France and along the Italian Riviera yesterday for the third consecutive day. Two thousand Britain-based bombers smashed at military objectives in Mannheim and Ludwigshafen, important Rhine cities.

The toll of 69,636 casualties suffered by the Germans in the Baltic sector during the past month brought to 609,526 the number of German soldiers killed and captured by the Russians since the gigantic summer offensive opened June 23, according to a statement from Moscow.

Marshal von Paulus, leader of the German forces that capitulated at Stalingrad, yesterday said that Germany has lost the war, Moscow reported. "Germany does not have the power to stem the tides in the East and West," the Marshal said.

The news of the Gen. was the first to leak out of the Soviet Union.

Eight three-round bouts will feature a ship boxing program scheduled for 1430 today in the ring located on the Promenade Deck, aft.

Many of the fighters listed for this afternoon's scraps spurred together in practice sessions yesterday afternoon. Six hundred men jammed into the sector surrounding the ring and cheered loudly for their favorites.

A pair of lightweights, Lt. Patrick Kenny, 133 pounds, of Chicago, Ill., and Pfc. William L. Woodrow, 135 pounds, of Washington, D.C., captured the limelight with an exhibition of startling boxing. Woodrow opened with a rush in the first round, landing hard and frequently, but Kenny came back later in the bout to punish his opponent with powerful blows to the head and body.

Every private had his chance to cheer when two second lieutenants climbed into the ring and proceeded to blast each other vigorously. Honors went evenly to Lt. Paul Tanga, of Denver, Colo., and Lt. Bill Bowers, Los Angeles, Calif., both 165 pounds. They will settle the score in another meeting today.

BONBONS MAY BEAT JAPAN, SAYS MINITZ

PEARL HARBOR — Admiral Chester Minitz, Commander-in-Chief of the Pacific Fleet, stated at Pearl Harbor yesterday that the United States may win the war against Japan without even invading that country. Heavy aerial bombings and naval shelling may be enough, he stated, to force the Japs to surrender. However, Admiral Minitz emphasized, only occupation by allied forces will preserve peace in the Pacific.

The war has moved so close to Japan, the Admiral indicated, that he soon may have to move his headquarte-

SOUTH FRANCE COAST FIRMLY HELD

Allied armies today are engaged in two large-scale offensives in France. The drive in the northwest, which opened with the invasion two months ago, now is reaching its climax with the encirclement of the German Seventh Army around Falaise. (The pocket southwest of Falaise, from which the Germans are attempting to flee, is indicated on the map at left.) The second invasion, which began two days ago, already has given the Allies a firm grip on the southern coast of France and promises to carry them northward through the Rhône Valley.

A plot Herbert P. Bender, who has prepared all art work appearing in “Rail Call,” has utilized most of the pages of this issue in a novel attempt to present a picture of the two fronts in relation to the rest of France. The areas where the fighting now is being waged are shown in detail, and the remainder drawn in as background silhouette.

AMERICANS TAKE ST. TROPEZ

ROME—Allied troops and supplies were being poured on to the beaches of Southern France yesterday, as positions between Cannes and Toulon were officially announced to be firmly consolidated, less than 48 hours after the original landings.

Heavy fighting continued around St. Tropez midway between Nice and Toulon, after the port city had been captured by American forces. The bulk of American fighting there belong to the 6th Army Corps, made up of seasoned North Beachhead veterans.

Air superiority of the Allies over the entire Mediterranean front was uncontested by enemy fighters yesterday as fleets of heavy bombers based in Italy pounded the port city of Marseilles and the manufacturing center of Grenoble.

Francheville were participating in the fight both in the air and on the sea. Several hundred French fliers, members of the Escadrille Lafayette, took part in yesterday’s raids. The French Navy was reborn in 1940 when a fleet of Free French vessels of all types, manned by more than 12,000 French sailors, participated in the great naval action ever seen in the Mediterranean.

More than 2000 Germans have been taken prisoner so far, while advanced parachute units, dropped for inland behind the German coastal defenses, have set up their own headquarters.

German radio reported last night that Allied forces have taken Cannes, and are already using the port city as a major supply depot.

In Normandy the move is tightening around the gap through which the German Seventh Army is attempting escape. All roads in the six mile area left to the Germans are being pounded day and night by Allied artillery and aviation.

Canadian troops late last night broke into Falaise, and heavy street fighting was going on there.

American forces dropped two million leaflets along the German front guaranteeing safe conduct behind Allied lines for surrendering Germans.
The evening had two sessions of her own version of the "Evening College of Musical Knowledge." The first session was on classical music, arranged and conducted by Lt. J. Bernard D. Smith, of Harvard University. The second session was on opera, conducted by Lt. J. Bernard D. Smith. The two sessions were held in the officers' lounge, "A," and were attended by large and enthusiastic crowds.

The evening quiz, with questions ranging from sports through geography and current events to classical music, was arranged and conducted by Lt. J. Bernard D. Smith, of Harvard University. The winner of this three-round elimination contest was Technical Sergeant Max Kraus, whose study of classical music helped greatly toward his winning the first prize of a carton of cigarettes. Sgt. Kraus, who is 21 years old, lives in New York City, is a graduate of Harvard University, and was teaching school when he was drafted.

All ten contestants were chosen from different parts of the ship. The "Evening College of Musical Knowledge" was directed by Pvt. Charles Salome (looking very much like Kay Kyser in a black gown) and was under the supervision of Lt. Robert X. Dunbar, Special Service Officer. The questions and quizzes were the work of several members of the ship's band, and the whole band, under the direction of Lt. Harry Hahlberg, contributed to the evening in entertainment.

RSUSSLLS OPEN NEW BRIDGHEADS

MOSCOW — Russian troops have opened new bridgeheads across the southern Vistula near Czecow, while German counterattacks on all fronts were thrown back, the Soviet High Command announced yesterday.

In the north, Red Army forces cut the Riga-Tallinn railroad, while on the Warsaw front, heavy fighting continues.

In the East Russian sector, the Russians captured at least two more fortified points.

The Russian Navy, meanwhile, is poised for any sudden evacuation efforts by German troops trapped against the Baltic.

The Russian High Command announced yesterday that in two months, since the start of the summer offensive, more than 150,000 Germans have been either killed or captured.

The "Red Star" magazine, the Soviet newspaper, expressed its joy over the latest Allied landings in Southern France, declaring that now not only is victory possible but it is a certainty.

The afternoon quiz, with questions ranging from sports through geography and current events to classical music, was sponsored and arranged by Lt. Bernard D. Smith. The capable master of ceremonies was Pfc. Bernard Creasy. The winner of this three-round elimination contest was Technical Sergeant Max Krasa, whose study of classical music and musical instruments was greatly toward his winning the first prize of a cartoon of cigarettes. Sgt. Krasa, who is 24 years old, lives in New York City, is a graduate of Harvard University and was teaching school when he was drafted.

All ten contestants were chosen from different parts of the ship.

The Evening College of Musical Knowledge was directed by Pfc. Charles Salmons, looking very much like Key Kyrer in a black gown, and was under the supervision of Lt. Robert A. Donagh, Special Service Officer. The questions and script were the work of several members of the ship’s band, and the evening was under the direction of Lt. Harry Heimb erg, contributed to the evening entertainment.

FOUR KEY FRENCH CITIES TAKEN

PATTON'S THIRD ARMY Closes Falaise Trap, Sweeps Toward Paris

American Third Army troops led by Lt General George S. Patton, Jr., swept through northern France in steamroller fashion yesterday to capture the important cities of Orleans, Chartres, Dreux, and Chartres (see map) on the roads to Paris, Supreme Allied Headquarters announced.

Moving swiftly after their dynamic victories, American forces are now reported 15 miles past Chartres - 25 miles from the French capital. German radio last night said the Americans were 20 miles from Paris, and artillery fire could be heard in the city.

American forces south of Falaise, meanwhile, have made contact with British-Canadian troops near Argentan, closing the last possible escape gap for remaining German Seventh Army troops, estimated at consisting of 14 divisions.

General Patton's troops have killed 11,000 Germans, captured 43,000, and wounded 47,500 in the few days since the opening of the latest campaign, it was officially announced.

Excitement in Paris is reported to be great, with Nazi and Vichy officials doing all they can to impose patriotic manifestations. Subway traffic has been halted to forestall meetings of patriots; Nazi authorities are beginning to evacuate various administrative offices.

The Paris Police Force is on strike because of the appointment of an unwanted official. Another strike halted operation of the two main French railway lines.
Magnificent hands and a brilliant mind are the keys to the amazing achievements of Toe 5 Jean-Pierre Barri- celli, who at 20 is the master of three arts, five musical instruments and nine languages.

Standing six feet, two inches high, and weighing 215 pounds, Barricelli looks more the football tackle than musician. Although he has utilized his athletic build to advantage, and was a member of the Varsity fencing team at Harvard University, he has always concentrated on music.

His musical accomplishments include the composition of an opera, "El Dorado", and an opera, "Robin Hood", which already is contracted for production in Chicago after the war. In addition, he has written numerous violin and piano pieces. Barricelli also has conducted two small symphony orchestras in his home town of Cleveland, Ohio, and in Boston, Mass., and has appeared as solo pianist on many concert programs. His other instruments are the violin, mandolin, tympany, and drums.

It is as a pianist that Barricelli is known on this ship. Since the first day out he has performed daily on the Promenade Deck for enlisted men; last night he played during dinner for the officers, offering Chopin Waltzes and Nocturnes, Weber's "Invitation to a Dance", and works by Schubert, Reinhold, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and Rachewell.

Barricelli, a native American, learned to speak Italian during a trip to Italy in 1933. His scholarship and his association with linguists through his mother who teaches classical and modern romance literature at Western Reserve University, account for his knowledge of Spanish, Portuguese, French, German, Latin, Greek and Russian.

In addition to his musical art, he has pursued the study of painting and sketching. He has appeared in amateur stage productions and has a collection of his own graphite drawings, oils and water colors.
GERMANS FLEE TOWARD SEINE

Russian troops fighting in East Prussia appeared to be driving toward Gumbinnen, 29 miles inside the border. The town was being shelled by heavy Soviet artillery.

GUMBINNEN, 29 MILES INSIDE THE BORDER

Supreme Allied Headquarters announced last night that the besieged Nazi garrison at St Malo has surrendered.

President Roosevelt said yesterday he would soon meet with Prime Minister Churchill. He announced the nomination of Major General Alexander Patch, Commander of Allied forces in Southern France, to Lieutenant General.

An agreement between Great Britain, Russia, and the United States, concerning the occupation of Germany has been reached.

GERMAN TROOPS IN NORTHERN FRANCE were fleeing eastward last night to escape the onrushing Allied armies and to meet the fleet of barges reported waiting to evacuate them across the Seine River.

Allied aviation harassed these operations, strafing and bombing road convoys and destroying more than 2000 vehicles of all types.

The larger part of the escaping troops, comprising units that managed to evade the Allied trap between Falaise and Argentan, were choking roads in the region 30 miles east of Falaise on their way toward the Seine.

The fleeing German forces, believed to be remnants of four panzer and two infantry divisions, as they raced northeastward for their projected rendezvous with the evacuation fleet, are penned in from both sides by Allied forces holding strong line runs from Falaise to Alençon on their west, while to the east the Germans have been by-passed by allied forces holding strong positions at the captured cities of Chateaudun, Chartres, Dreux, and Orleans.

The American Third Army, under command of Gen George S. Patton, Jr, continued its drive toward Paris, with one column advancing to a point 23 miles west of the French capital in the Dreux sector, another moving into positions 37 miles south of Paris, above Orleans.

Allied forces in Southern France moved up to 25 miles inland at some points, while fighting continued for the coastal cities of Five title bouts that will determine ship's boxing champions for the voyage will be held at 1400 today on the Promenade Deck, aft. Each bout will be four rounds.

Fighters who emerged victorious in the elimination round last Tuesday will be pitted against each other in three of the bouts. Another will bring together again two men who battled to a draw on the last card, while in the fifth bout, Staff Sergeant Ralph Navy, 135 pounds, stringbean slugger from San Francisco, Calif., will meet newcomer Huson, 130 pounds.

Main bout of the day will be the rematch of the draw, with ex-Golden Gloves champion Pvt Vincent J. Di Venti, 180, of Baltimore, Md., facing Cpl Ralph Colla, 170, of Youngstown, Ohio. In their last meeting, the pair put on a startling boxing exhibition, with Colla taking everything that was thrown for two rounds and coming back with his own attack in the final minutes to finish even on points.

The struggle for the heavyweight crown will be divided between Pvt William, 190, pounds, of Cleveland, Ohio, and Pvt John, 190, of Chicago, Ill.

Both fighters have had considerable amateur boxing experience, and last time annexed well-earned decisions over their respective opponents, Cpl Tony Messina, of New York City, and Pvt Dick Alexander, of Cleveland, Ohio.

A slinger will meet a boxer for the middleweight championship, Pvt Christy DiNapola, 155, of Akron, Ohio, centers on Sgt Clint Collins, 160, of Montevideo, Minn. DiNapola exhibited tremendous punching power in his last victory, while Collins outpointed his opponent with a display of clever boxing style.

Popular Pvt Patrick Kenny, of Chicago, Ill., will oppose Pvt John Kaczkol, 135 pounds, of Bay City, Mich., in another lightweight bout.

The welterweight crown has been conceded to Cpl Luther Heathcote, 177, of Baltimore, Md., who won a decision in this class on Tuesday and could not be matched in the finals.

Heathcote, another former Golden Gloves champion, will serve as referee for the five championship bouts. Judges will be Lt Paul Miluk and Lt Mike Adish, who, together with Heathcote, will render the decisions. Lt Virgil Trump will announce, and Lt Bill Beers and Mr. Robert Benson will assist in the corners.

The seconds are Pvt Mike Khol, Pvt Milton Rayers, Cpl Harold Brown, Cpl Frank Polly and Sgt James Messick, and the timekeeper, Fred Stockfish. Sgt John P. Hart, Medical Corps, will be on duty for the matches.

Last night the GI audience up on the Promenade Deck had a chance to hear what the officers could furnish in the way of entertainment, and, judging from their response, the show was a great success. With Lt George S. Sherrard of Salisbury, Conn., acting as master of ceremonies, the show started off with a barber-shop trio consisting of Lts George W. Pratt, Ted J. Keyser, and Robert Carpenter. Lt Pratt, who admits to coming from Georgia, told a couple of jokes, and Lt Carpenter told a short inspirational story.

In a more serious musical vein, Lt James D. Buntrock of Bridgeport, Conn., gave a stirring vocal rendition of Romberg's 'Stout Hearted Lion,' and encored with 'The Desert Song' by request, 'Old Man River.'

The place de resistance of the evening was the appearance on the stage of Cal Irving O'Dell, Transoair Commander. Though protesting that he could play only with hillbilly bands, O'Dell nevertheless gave a very good account of himself on the drums. Keeping a straight face, he demonstrated a boogie-woogie pianist; when one appeared and started playing, the Colonel relaxed into smile and began boating it out. The pianist, incidentally, announced his willingness to play anything. Before leaving, Co O'Dell called for two other colonels to appear on the stage, and jokingly threatened them with dire punishment when they failed to show up.
AMERICANS REPORTED AT VERSAILLES

LONDON—German reports stated last night that an American column has reached Versailles (see map), 10 miles due west of Paris, the British Broadcasting Corporation announced. There was no confirmation from allied sources.

Two other columns of the fast-moving Third Army led by Gen George S. Patton, Jr., were placed by Allied front-line correspondents 35 miles northwest and 19 miles southeast of Paris, on the Seine River. The column to the northwest was between Nantes and Vernon, where it is seeking to prevent the evacuation of German troops across the river. Late reports stated that 85 large German invasion barges, carrying approximately 500 men each, and including some of the type constructed in 1940 for the invasion of England, were sunk in the Seine by Allied aircraft between Nantes and Rouen. The German radio said American forces already had crossed the Seine south of Rouen, and that paratroopers have been landed east of the Seine between Rouen and Paris.

South of Paris, General Patton has sent the spearheads toward the Seine. One reached the river at Melun, 19 miles southeast of the French capital, and the other was closing in on Fontainebleau farther south.

To the northwest, in the pocket between Falaise and Argenton, Lt Gen Omar Bradley’s First Army and General Montgomery’s British-Canadian Army continued the liquidation of the German Seventh Army. The remnants of 14 divisions were still believed to be fighting frantically in this sector. Prisoners were shot out of forests and caves by Allied troops as they made their final attempt to escape.

SEVENTH ARMY PUSHES TO AIX-EN-PROVENCE

HOME—American Seventh Army troops drove to Aix-en-Provence last night, thereby outflanking the important coastal cities of Marseilles and Toulon to the south.

Aix, a communications center 15 miles north of Marseilles, straddles the escape routes that might have been used by German forces to evacuate the region.

The combined French-American forces also were said to have reached the Durance River, near Vixon, 33 miles north of Toulon.

Toulon, France’s chief naval base, was underpinning, a thunderous attack by American artillery.

It was reported that 15,000 prisoners have been taken in the south since the start of the invasion.

General Charles DeGaulle arrived at Cherbourg last night, accompanied by General Alphonse Juin, to confer with General Koenig, leader of the French Forces of the Interior.

Russian troops yesterday smashed back into Praga, suburb of Warsaw. Inside Warsaw, Polish underground forces continued to fight the Germans, with the aid of supplies dropped by allied planes based in Italy.

A United Nations conference on post-war international security will open today in Washington, with Russia, Great Britain, China and the United States represented.
Joint statement by Capt Spruille and Col Odell: "The newspaper and broadcasts on this trip have been the best ever produced aboard this transport."

RADIO ANNOUNCER WELCH BRINGS SHIPBOARD NEWS

"Every day at this time..."
For many days this salute in the familiar voice of Tec 3 Edgar Welch has introduced the news programs that have been carried over the public address system.
You've probably heard the voice before, because Welch was formerly a newspaper writer for the New York Times; editor of a daily news broadcast sponsored by Horn and Hardart in New York; a staff member of radio station WMAQ; and a narrator for films. For the past eight years he has been producer, announcer, and news and script writer for radio stations in New York and New England. During this voyage, his twice-daily newscasts have become highlights of the day for many of the personnel on board.

TIE IN CHESS FINALS WILL MEET AGAIN TODAY

The chess tournament currently being conducted by the ship's Special Service took an unusual turn yesterday when the two finalists, Capt William Lubetsky and Sgt Ralph Meyer, played to a draw. The replay of this final match will take place today.
Earlier in the day, in a semi-final play-off, Sgt Meyer won over Cpl Leonard Bartolletti to qualify for the final round.
In a separate "rapid transit" or "blitz" tournament of five rounds, with one move being made every ten seconds, Capt Lubetsky led the field with four points, while Cpl Bartolletti was runner-up with 3 ½.
Tec 4 Leonard DeLane and Pvt John Morris each scored three points. At the end of four rounds, four contestants had been tied for first place, and only in the final round did Capt Lubetsky establish his lead.
The games have taken place in the Officers' Lounge, and seem to have been contagious. Numerous private games were being played throughout the day.

BRUNETTE MERMAID SIGHTED OFF PORT SIDE

A mermaid was reported sighted off portside yesterday. Four G.I.'s taking a breather from a hot poker session (no bills showing) went to the rail where they saw her sitting on a whitecap. There she was combing her long brunette hair, just like a fairy tale.
"A RAIL CALL" correspondent immediately rushed to the scene, anything to scrounge the radio section, but no mermaid was there.
Speculation was rife as to what actually had been seen. One Joe stated sarcastically—"It must have been an amphibious Man" (Editor's Note—The writer of the foregoing dispatch is now serving Spam in the mess hall.)
CAPTAIN ALBERT P. SPAULDING
COMMANDER OF SHIP

I would like to express my appreciation for the performance of the men aboard this ship. As troops your conduct has been as good as any this ship has ever carried. As good soldiers you have kept your quarters clean, adapted yourselves to the routine of the ship, and obeyed the orders given you.

I would also like to thank the members of the staff of the Ship Newspaper and the Daily News Broadcast for their cooperation and to commend them on the excellent job they have done throughout the voyage.

I wish each of you the best of luck and health in your new endeavors and may this year bring victory and peace to you and yours.

You have been fine and pleasant shipmates and I sincerely hope that I may soon have the pleasure of taking you on the best voyage of all - the long voyage home.

To each of you a sailor's farewell: "Goodbye, good luck, and God bless you."

COLONEL IRVING ODELL TRANSPORT COMMANDER

The hardest part of each voyage for me is saying, "Au Revoir". I always experience a feeling of regret at not being able to accompany those who leave us for their adventure into the great unknown.

Your whole-hearted cooperation while aboard this vessel is deeply appreciated, and all of us who are permanent members of the Ship's Staff thank you for the manner in which you have carried out your various duties. We are especially grateful to the officers (continued on page 4)
Once Upon A Time

The S.S. Washington was three days out from New York on her way to Southampton. It was August, and the ocean seemed unnaturally calm. I had had a busy day ever since my first game of shuffleboard on the sun deck after breakfast. My opponent had been one of those casual but welcome acquaintances so characteristic of transatlantic voyages. After that, I had passed the morning leaning over the rail, strolling around the Promenade Deck and now and then flopping into a deck chair while a steward brought crackers and fruit juice.

In this manner the time passed pleasantly until it was time for lunch. Casting the usual envious glances at those most fortunate passengers who were sitting at the Captain's table, I made my way to the corner table which I had been assigned to share with three other travelers. At every meal I marvelled at the wonderful arrangement whereby every passenger pays a flat rate at the beginning of his voyage and is thereafter entitled to as many helpings of as many dishes as his constitution, or perseverance the weather, allows him to swallow. This is more evident, of course, at dinner than at the midday meal, since luxury liners ignore the advice of doctors and continue to serve their principal meal in the evening. Nevertheless, you could hardly call the luncheon menu primitive. Five courses were all I permitted myself, and it was a tough struggle deciding what to eat.

More than an hour later, considerably refreshed, I left the dining room, looking forward to an afternoon which would probably include a nap, some deck tennis, tea in the lounge to the strains of the ship's orchestra, and perhaps some late afternoon bridge.

At about six o'clock I repaired to my cabin to have a shower and to change into my togs. This was to be a gala night, and in honor of the occasion I discarded my ready-made butterfly tie and struggled painfully in front of a mirror tying the genuine article. Especially this evening (and in fact most evenings) was the occasion for the ladies to appear in full regalia. As a result, they usually disappeared from the decks at five to begin their elaborate toilette. But the results seen in the dining room, were always worth the effort.

This grand occasion was celebrated by an extra special display of food. Caviar was evident everywhere, followed by smoked salmon, canardoupe, mushroom soup, filet of sole, roast duckling, strawberry shortcake, and coffee. Gradually, in a somewhat unsteady topsy-turvy fashion, everyone drifted into the lounge for the dance. Unfortunately, the sea had begun to act up a bit, and during the second number my partner lurched and stopped on my toe. That was when I woke up and found somebody's size twelve GI shoe on my foot as I was sloping in the passageway on the S.S. (censored).

Editor's Note: In looking for someone who had made the transatlantic crossing as a civilian, and who could write a comparison of the old luxury liner trip of pre-war days with that of a troop transport, it was found that Joe W. Walter M. Simon was going across for his twentieth time. Nineteen crossings as a civilian and one as a GI should satisfy anyone. But Simon now is hoping to make his 21st crossing in the near future.

Last Night

Last night I held a lovely hand
A hand so soft and neat,
I thought my heart
Would burst with joy,
So wildly did it beat.
No other hand unto My heart
Could greater solace bring Than that dear hand
I held last night

FOUR ACES AND A KING.

We realize the discomfort which many of you have suffered in crowded and poorly ventilated areas. However, this condition could not have been avoided - complete blackout is imperative, personal comfort is secondary. The primary mission of safely transporting all aboard this ship is paramount, and as we near our destination it is reasonable to suppose that the first step in placing you side by side with our gallant troops now engaged in driving the enemy out of the conquered countries has been accomplished.

May God be with you the remainder of your journey... good luck wherever you may go.

COMMANDING GENERAL, 6266-P

As we near our destination I desire to take this opportunity to commend Captain Spaulding and his fine crew for the excellent manner in which this ship has been operated. They have been not only courteous and considerate of the military but also able and efficient in the performance of their duties. Such a demonstration marks them as a splendid group of seamen. My hat is off to them.

No less deserving of praise is Colonel Odell and his staff of permanent military personnel aboard. They have organized and operated a diversified group into a proficient military team. I salute Yawata, Japan's principal steel center, was bombed again yesterday by American B-29 "Superfortresses". Other Pacific islands attacked by U. S. bombers in the past few weeks are indicated on the map.

Soon you will land in the British Isles, and you may be lucky enough to get a pass. If your poker games have left you solvent, our advice is: Don't spend your money too liberally; remember that you are the highest paid soldier in the world; don't rub it in; don't bid up prices; it isn't fair to the British who are trying very hard to let everyone get a fair share of the scarce supplies.

When you are in British territory, you have the choice of being paid in either British or American currency. The American money you are carrying can be exchanged by your base finance officer into British money, if you so desire. Go to him if you want to get the most out of your American money. Frequently, the Red Cross also will exchange money for you. The other possibility is to change it at a bank.

You will become accustomed to carrying copper and silver coins, which come in convenient denominations. The most frequently used coins are: 1 penny (1d. is worth about 2p); sixpence (6d. worth 10p); shilling (1s. worth 20p); half a crown (2s. 6d. worth 50p); and a crown (5s. 10p).

1. EMERGING TRENDS: Evidence that the Allies were losing the tremendous "battle of attrition" in the Aachen sector was offered by the German military commanders, and one went so far as to claim that the Allies had already been defeated in this campaign. It was pointed out that General Eisenhower had committed masses of men and material and had burned innumerable streams of reserves, but that there had been no compensatory gains of territory. A picture was presented of American troops "decomposing" by the mud, cold, rains, and the lack of air support. In all reports, the "heavy losses" being suffered by the Anglo-Americans were stressed.

German successes were clinched in the southern sector, where a powerful counter-thrust was said to have been launched against the Allied wedge through the Germain depression.

On the front, Dr. Goebbels told the people that the passage of time has enabled the German nation to rediscover its old fighting power. He cited the growing "war weariness" of the enemy compared with Germany's increasing strength, and declared that the Germans will fight fanatically and will never capitulate.

   - Wester Front: Claims that the "battle of attrition" in the Aachen sector has become a battle for the western powers were made yesterday by DB's military analyst, Dr. Alex Krull.

   Characterizing the struggle in the northern sector of the western front as "the most gigantic material battle of the war," Dr. Krull declared that the German soldier has passed the battle test by his determined resistance, whereas "the enemy has been forced already to use his reserves to fill up the bloody holes in his ranks."

   Dr. Krull pointed out that General Eisenhower has sacrificed more men and material than the British and the German at sea, but in the past ten days has gained only seven miles of ground. He maintained that the Allies have failed in their attempts to crack the German front at Luxembourg, and therefore "the German leaders have won the first round in the battle for a breakthrough to the Ruhr" (DB Hall 1945).

   Heavy American losses and the "generalization" of American troops because the weather has deprived them of air support were again stressed by Alex Schmalzmeier, war reporter for DB. Reviewing the situation in this sector, he wrote:

   "The lack of effective air support has lessened the confidence of the Americans in their own power of power action. The widely and very strongly mined territory represents a great difficulty for the attacker, especially since the German artillery after unprepared attack from the front and their well-aimed fire. The Americans are aware that the greatest difficulties of the territory are still ahead of them. The river bed of the Ruhr, which is cut by many parallel streams in not only heavy because of the continuous rain of the past days, but also flooded. And even if the Germans should ever wear this strip of swamp, they are being cut on the other side of the Ruhr by a territory which has no favor difficulties" (DB Hall 1945).

   Transvaal's Daily Star fell the "front fighting" in the sector between the Worm and Ruhr rivers, around the town of Irsel and Julich (Transvaal Norton 1945).

   Additional details were offered by Transvaal's Walter Plate, who wrote: "The Americans reported their triumphs north of Heltenkirchen, west of Julich, and southeast of Echweiler, but fiercely fighting German defense forces denied them success. The thrusts were answered by counterthrusts during which terrain southwest of Limich and west of Julich was retaken by the Germans. The thrust of the battle in the Arachen area was borne by Americans, with the British participating only north of Geilenkirchen. The British again opened their battle for Venlo on the Maas" (Transatlantic Morse 1200).

The communiqué stated that the Americans threw in fresh forces from rear areas between Geilenkirchen and Echweiler to "compensate for heavy losses." It was also claimed that German artillery fire scattered tank concentrations and dissipated American attacks in the Arachen Forest (German counter).

Reports to the home audience stressed the point that the battle near Arachen is increasing in violence, e. the enemy choses in rear and more reserves "in spite of his clearly recognized failures." The broadcast announced that 154 American tanks had been knocked out in the past 100 hours, but that the enemy continued his attack "despite highest losses" and was concentrating his blows south of Geilenkirchen, on the road to Duren (CBS 2200).

German forces progess played prominently the 13 air forces who have shot down 240 to 300 Allied planes, in juxtaposition to reports of suffering American prisoners whose feet are "bleeding and frozen" (CBS 2100, 2300). In the overseas broadcast, Allied editorials were quoted to prove the invincibility of the "German defense system" (CBS 085).

Transmissions for the European press declared that the "terrible major attack" in the Arachen area was reaching its "decisive stage." Focusing the battle as "violent and extremely bloody," the reports said the Germans succeeded in retaking all terrain previously conquered by the Americans in the valley of Limich, between Geilenkirchen and Julich. It was also stated that the British Second Army failed in an attempt to outflank German positions from the south of the Maas bridgehead near Venlo (CBS 1123, 1740, 2300).

A German European service broadcast from Stuttgart asserted that "there can be no question of a breakthrough of the German front at any point." It said enemy assaults have been broken and that if there had been a "rectification of the front-line" of about seven miles it had been made "according to the decision of the German High Command." (CBS 1316).

In the southern sector of the western front, the possibility that General Patton will turn his right wing toward the north to reach the Fulda border of Germany was mentioned by Transatlantic's editorials. He said this evasuality could be foreseen as a result of the new thrusts by Third Army vanguard which crossed the middle near south of Saarloben and penetrated through the Arachen forest.

On the other hand, editorials added, there is the chance that Patton will put aside his plan for attack, the strong west wall fortifications along the Herzog-Saarbruecken-Francois line in favor of cooperation with the Seventh U. S. Army now invading central France.

A powerful German counterthrust against the "induction wedge" of the Seventh Army in the severe depression was reported by Sertorius. He said the attack by German infantry reserves had advanced on a broad front toward Saarland and southward toward Saarbruecken. Sertorius predicted that General Fritsch would be forced to throw in reserves to prevent cutting off of the wedge and hinted that this would interfere with his plans to swing around on the Helheim-Stroisbruch line to establish contact with the first French Army (Transatlantic Morse 1720).

CBS's Schollflus also pointed out that German flank attacks were threatening the penetration at the Saarline stage, and noted that blocking formations were succeeding in containing the French units which broke through the Burgundy Gate along the Swiss border (CBS 1750).

The communiqué reiterated reports of the German attack north of Sarrelorbe, but it failed to admit to the home front Allied penetrations in the Bischof forest, stating only that American enemy attacks in this sector of eastern Lorraine had been "frustrated" (German counter).

Other home service broadcasts said that the American penetration to Strasbourg has been narrowed from about 20 to eight miles as a result of the new German attacks. The "liberation" of Fulmen, Heilbronn, and Marmaillot was announced (CBS 2200).

Important initial successes in the tank attack north of Sarrelorbe were claimed in the reports for European press. Forty-seven tanks were said to have been destroyed and 2,000 prisoners taken.

At 0900, reports admitted that both Strasbourg and Mulhouse "are in the hands of the enemy," but at 1000 it was stated that in Strasbourg "fighting was contin-
A press release by General Eisenhower of 23 November was quoted by the German European services as proof that the battle in Alsace and Lorraine cannot compare in strategic importance to those around Auchin. Eisenhower was quoted as saying: "We must not exaggerate the importance of the military operations in Alsace and Lorraine. We must not underestimate the power of Germany, whose forces are intact, numerous, excellently equipped, and animated by a fanatical bravery that makes our enemy an irreducible adversary" (GES 1315).

4. German Home Front: Dr. Goebbels declared yesterday that the German nation had "rediscovered its self-confidence and found new defensive power and that now it will never capitulate to the enemy." Speaking at a frontier capital that had been hard hit by Allied bombers, Dr. Goebbels portrayed the enemy "losing a risky war with the war of time."

"The increasing crisis in the enemy camp is expressed by the valiant time which Germany has gained by the courageous defense of the channel ports and Atlantic strong points," he said. "This has enabled Germany to recover after the past three months her old proven fighting and defensive power."

Pointing out that "every day will increase Germany's chances to use her newly mobilized Volkssturm forces as effectively as possible," Dr. Goebbels stated that the delves were at the same time proving costly to the enemy. He cited the false hopes of the Anglo-Americans for quick victory, which were being replaced now by a predominance of "war weariness" and new herds. Discussing the "frozen" east Russian drive, he said it proves that the enemy's worst fears the farther he distances himself from his home supply and recruiting bases.

Dr. Goebbels praised that German technique and research were eagerly at work to overcome enemy advantages in certain fields, notably the air war. In the meantime, he said, the German people "has no other choice but to fight fanatically and determinedly and to prepare itself for its great hour."

On a tour of several cities in this heavily bombed region, Dr. Goebbels expressed to the population the appreciation of the Führer for their exemplary steadfastness and bravery of all "Volkssturm." He said that the determined stand and unyielding effort of the population were proved by the successful continuation of war production in places whose weapons were being built despite all obstacles. How tasks of the people in connection with civil land defense and total mobilization were also explained by Dr. Goebbels (DMB 1915; GES 2200; GHS 2200).

A large part of the "Review of the Situation" by Hans Hertel was taken up by an analysis of the problems leading to the resignation of the Polish premier in London.

It was pointed out that if the Führer's solution for Poland had been adopted in 1933, much devastation and millions of lives would have been saved. Hertel said it was the refusal of the Allies to admit German control over Danzig and the corridor to East Prussia that had led to war. Now, he added, Britain and the United States are not guaranteeing the independence of Poland, but have turned it over to "Soviet tyranny." Both actions have yielded their influence over Poland to the Stalin committee in Russia, he said (GES 1315).

In an article in Der Angriff quoted by DMB for the European press, Dr. Robert Ley praised the tireless German worker who is "producing in a manner which resembles magic." He said the industrialists deserved full credit too, for restoring full production of weapons, instruments, and ammunition despite frequent bombing attacks.

"There is no doubt that the German industrialists and their personnel have never capitulated regardless of how seemingly helpless the situation seemed to them all," Dr. Ley wrote. "They were forced to rebuild plants every time and won the fight against terror and fear. Today I know for sure that nothing at all will be able to paralyze the German production of weapons and ammunition" (DMB 1915).

Pointing up the constant flow of new workers to industry, the German Labor Front announced that in November 400,000 groups of industrial workers were incorporated into heavy and medium industries. The labor front provides industry with 900,000 men and women for the factories each month (GES 1315).

dispatch, which stated:

"The fighting on the eastern front has again increased in the Hungarian area between Budapestr and Ungvar, however without forming any special focal points. This can be traced to the fact that the Soviet leadership is convinced that it cannot achieve any great successes in this area.

"The battle in Kurland is as good as lost for the Soviets. The strongest attack of the Beloshvists is being combated with the total of eight armies. But no success could be achieved because of the strong German resistance. From the entire battle situation in this area it can be seen that the German bridgehead is completely fulfilling its purpose, namely: (1) to draw the enemy armies from East Prussia, and (2) to use up these armies in Kurland" (DNB Roll 1239).

Although most transmissions denied the Russians any successes (Transcauc. Horse 1906, 1940; DNB Roll 1110, 1925; GHS 1200, 1926, 2280; GHS 1315; GHS 963), there were occasional indications of some Russian gains. One DNB dispatch stated that in the Kurland area Russian attacks "were partly repelled in counterattacks and small penetrations were boweled down" (DNB Roll 1260).

Another one reported, "South of Nisha the German troops defended themselves all day long against very superior forces. Protected by darkness, the front was taken back to the southeastern sector of the town" (DNB Roll 1290).

Many transmissions announced that the Dnake peninsula garrison had been "succeesfuly evacuated" and the evening DNB summary acknowledged that the Soviet had landed reinforcements on the Dnake Island of Iosep (DNB Roll 1309).

c. Italian front: Having predicted a large American attack in Italy for several weeks, DNB finally announced, "The Fifth American Army has completed, after weeks of preparation, its new concentrations. The newly established batteries have started their fire. It is possible that the attack against the Monte Belvedere, which was opened yesterday, is the beginning of a new offensive" (DNB Roll 1265).

The British drive northeast of Forli was granted a one-kilometer advance (DNB Roll 1365, 1355).

For the second time in the past two weeks, a German source announced the resignation of the Economist government (DNB Roll 1289).

d. Political front: Having argued intensely for months that the Polish problem is as insoluble for the Allies, that Poland had been wantonly abandoned to Belohevits, etc., Berlin rode on the resignation of Polish Prime Minister Mikalszyk and filled all transmissions with "this final proof that all possibility of an understanding between the London Poles and Moscow has been buried forever." DNB's diplomatic correspondent, Dr. Siegfried Horn, eulogized Berlin's propaganda on the event. "The American and English refused to give the Russian government any guarantee about Poland's future borders yet things are rolling and showed that England and the U.S. were not thinking of splitting with Moscow because of Poland. Poland is being sacrificed..." (DNB Roll 1290).

The official Wilhelminian spokesman later rode the same point, adding that England's former guarantees to Poland has now been turned up, and that the new Prime Minister Jan Wykowski, would have no more success than his predecessors (DNB Roll 1289).

Typical of comment on the matter in German domestic transmissions was: "Shortly before his resignation, the Premier of the London Poles was received by the American Ambassador to London, Harriman, who is staying in London at present. The Ambassador told him that the U.S. was in no position to support the London Poles, thus, the Premier was confirmed that Poland and the U.S. had betrayed the London Poles and resigned" (GHS 1200). All other transmissions carried similar reports (DNB 1315; DNB 1261, 1360, 1243; Transcauc. Horse 1362).

Meanwhile, Berlin was also quick to point out that this Anglo-American appeasement of the Kremlin by no means heralded the end of Inter-Allied difficulties. A long DNB release, for instance, credited the editor in chief of the Berlin Hochrichten with an article about the poor progress being made in Allied post-war plans. A symptom of basic trouble, it was said, was the reported postponement of the conference between Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin. The general argument was that the Soviet's intense exploitation of the shog in western Europe might eventually force the U.S., "back into her shell of isolationism, which would make all post-war plans hopeless, leaving the field clear for Bolshevism" (DNB Roll 1510, 2134).

Also, Berlin made it clear, the Allies were still having great troubles intern-
A. Allegations of anti-Soviet stirrings in Russia, details of the confusion being spread in the U. S. by the telephone operators' strike, and reports of demonstrations in Canada against conscription for overseas duty were played prominently in all transmissions (G-1400, 2000, 2200; DNB Bull 105, 1655, 1825; GAS 1810; Transmission Order 1220).

f. Western Europe: Berlin's routine propaganda on the hunger and misery in western Europe was spilled heavily with reports exploiting "the bloody incidents" in Brussels on Saturday, "when the police tried to stop a demonstrating crowd near the government buildings." The police reportedly fired on the demonstrators and even used hand grenades. "King Pierlot" was said to have been the crowd's cry (DNB Bull 2110).

g. Pacific Front: All transmissions continued to give great prominence to reports of Japanese successes in the Philippines, in Burma and particularly in China. The important evening "Mirror of the Times" in the German home service opened with a report that "it has become known that General Chiang Kai-Shek is about to evacuate Chungking." Reviewing all Japanese gains in China, as well as the Chinese government's military and political differences with the U. S., Berlin reported that Japanese forces were now approaching the Chinese capital "and the town is seriously threatened" (GAS 1800).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: The DNB military commentators agreed that a large-scale offensive will be launched soon by Field Marshal Montgomery, opening with a British attempt to cross the Maas River near Venlo.

There were no essential changes reported on the fighting in the Aachen sector, although the Americans were said to have resumed their attacks after "intense artillery preparations."

Fighting increased in violence in the southern sector, as the Allies attacked in several directions and the drive was continued to link the American Seventh Army and French First Army at Mulhouse. Several towns were said to have been re-taken by the Germans in counterattacks against a flank of Patton's Third Army.

The Germans admitted for the first time that the Allies have reached the Rhine at Strasbourg and Mulhouse, and said fighting has ceased in Strasbourg.

Lt. Gen. Dittmar told the home audience in an evening broadcast that the Germans are discovering there are limits to the personnel and material superiority of the enemy. He said the refortified defensive positions in the Aachen sector were preventing the Allies from achieving any noteworthy successes and were causing a gradual destruction of their military resources. He admitted the "painful loss" of German soil in the south, and blamed it on the inability of the defenders to consolidate their positions there in time to meet the Allied assault.

a. Western Front: DNB's military analysts simultaneously reported yesterday that a British attempt to cross the Maas River near Venlo will be the signal for a new large-scale attack to be launched soon by Field Marshal Montgomery.

War reporter Alex Schmullius pointed out that advance divisions of the British Second Army are maintaining their pressure against the German bridgeheads on the left bank of the Maas near Aachen, and that British Eighth Corps is assigned the task of supporting the crossing of the river as soon as Montgomery opens his drive. Dr. Alex Krull stated that although the British have been unsuccessful in their attempts to liquidate the German bridgeheads near Venlo and thereby to establish a line along the Maas which they intend to start their next major attack. He added that the Allies will "not find the German unprepared in the Dutch area if they decide to try to overcome the difficult obstacles of the Maas and Rhine."

Schmullius traced the main battleline in the northern sector as running south, along the Maas from Venlo to Roermond, and across the river there into Germany at Limburg and Willich, on the rear. Heavy fighting was reported in the region, as well as at Marchen in the Sauer Forest.

Dr. Krull said that the Allies continue to concentrate to their attacks east of Aachen, where strengthened artillery and tank units are being employed in the drive to take Willich. "The clear winter weather which has suddenly startled the enemy in this attack, but he has not been able to break open the German lines," said Dr. Krull (DNB Daily 11:50, 11:52).

Transocean's Guenther Weber reported "no essential change" in the situation in the Aachen area, but maintained that the unimpaired efforts of Generals Hodges and Simpson to "break and breach through German positions on the Rear River" had cost them a daily average loss of 2,000 men (Transocean News 11:50).

A study of the probable effects of winter weather on the current campaign was offered by Transocean's Leukotties. He predicted that the frozen terrain will enable Allied tank formations to make better headway, but that infantrymen will be more exposed to German artillery fire and will suffer heavy losses. "This frequency and density of snow will determine whether the Allies will be able to continue throwing into the scale the air superiority which they have enjoyed 100 percent so far," he stated (Transocean Morse 1230).

The communiqué added that the attacks northeast of Aachen had been resumed after "intense artillery preparation," but that they had been repulsed by German defensive activity (German communique). A home service broadcast reported violent enemy blows against the lines bridgedhead and artillery duels between Germans and enemy units on either side of the river (CBS 0700, 2200).

The overseas service announced the retaking of the towns of Kolsaue and Burheim near Julich, and said enemy attacks were repulsed north of Aachen and southeast of Duren (CBS 0845).

Large-scale operations north of Aachen were continued by American forces, according to reports for the European press, but the attacks were "bloody repulsed" in the entire area. The German peoples' artillery corps was credited with the destruction of many U. S. tank and infantry positions (CBS 1125, 1246, 1645).

On the southern sector of the western front, Schmallfuss admitted a slight withdrawal of German positions at Ernholz in the Saar area, but declared emphatically that "between Nersig and Saarbrucken the enemy has neither reached nor crossed the Saar River."

Schmallfuss added that the "prophesy of the enemy" that the American Seventh Army will soon be linked with the French First Army is "silly," because a 40-mile strip of terrain in German hands now lies between them.

A picture of increasingly violent fighting in this sector was presented by Dr. Krull, who said the Allies were extending their attacks in many directions. He admitted that the French have received reinforcements and are now pressing toward the north from the Swiss border in the direction of Altkirch and Mulhouse.

After pointing out that the Americans are pushing northward from Strasbourg toward Haguenau and southeast toward Mulhouse in an attempt to link up there with the French army, Dr. Krull contradicted the Schmallfuss viewpoint and indicated that the next few days might see the fulfillment of this aim (CBS 1120, 1921).

Transocean's Weber claimed that an attack by Patton against the Saar line near Nersig several days ago appeared to have broken through the "barrier," but that the German forces which at first had withdrawn later broke into the Third Army's flank, annihiliing several American units and recapturing the towns of Tatinan and Oberhausen (Transocean Morse 1235).

The communiqué reported that the garrisons at Aitze continued to hold out, and that further south German forces destroyed 63 American tanks north of Saarburg in Lorraine and 33 tanks in the Alsace region (German communique). Other home service broadcasts reported the same details, adding only that the Americans had penetrated into Alsace territory northeast of Ferre and later were wiped out by German forces (CBS 2200, 0700).

The first admission that the Allies have reached the Rhine at Strasbourg and Mulhouse was made in a broadcast for the forces. It was pointed out, however, that the enemy has failed thus far to join his two armies in Mulhouse and Strasbourg, and that in any case "our real defenses only begin on the other side of the Rhine." (CBS 1100). The European service broadcast from Stuttgart also stated that "fighting has ceased in Strasbourg" (CBS 1115).

An overseas service broadcast placed principal Third Army attacks between the Moselle and the Saar in Lorraine, and said the Seventh American Army and French First were attacking between the Vosges and the Pfalz Gap (CBS 0845).

Transmissions for the European press claimed tremendous American losses in German counterattacks in the northern sector of the Lorraine front. They said that despite the aid of bomber resupply preceding American thrusts north of Saarburg, the "enemy lost 50 percent of his tanks from them" (CBS 1121 1257, 1945).

The transmissions also contained a report by a German prisoner of war who escaped after three weeks internment by the Allies. He was quoted as saying that he had been cured by an interrogator that his gold wrist watch, gold ring, and all his money had been stolen, and that he had been locked in a cell for three days without food because he refused to reply to interrogations. He said he was finally put to work to build fortifications and lay wires in the forward lines, from where he managed to escape (CBS 1112 1800).

b. German Home Front: The "symptomatic" battles at Aachen which have thus far prevented the Allies from achieving success are proving that there are limits to the personal and material superiority of the enemy. Lt. Gen. Dittmer declared last night in a radio talk to the home audience, "Presenting a candid picture of the situation along the western front, Dittmer stated that in the southern sector the Allies had been successful because their attacks were made against positions that had not yet been fortified to meet the blow. On the other hand, he said, in the north the enemy's superiority was not by a "strength of resistance which so far has been strong enough to prevent him from risking any operational success."

"What has been proved in the course of the operations on the southern wing of the front is that we are still standing between the yesterday and the tomorrow," declared Dittmer. "What this signifies in respect of the necessities of the conduct of war should be quite clear. We are not yet strong enough to be able to put up everywhere the needed fighting strength, according to the requirements of the situation. But we quite clearly state (not yet). What this means should be beyond anyone's doubt. We are not yet strong enough, but we can become so."

Dittmer boasted that the "interior and exterior recapture of German fighting strength" was a miracle that was being realized from an operational viewpoint. He said it was the factor that prevented the Allies from gaining their objectives of "being faster than the enemy"; of breaking the fluid situation along the front and creating a fluid situation, and of securing significant victories by virtue of superiority of material and personnel.

After admitting the "painful loss of German soil" and the "not unimportant gains" of the Allies in the south, Dittmer asserted that resources seem would be taken in this sector so that the German fighting strength there could equal that around Munich. Pointing to the terrific resistance and high fighting morale of German forces in the Munich fighting, he said the ability to defend, then to counterattack heavily was causing the American high casualties and are the start of the battle of destruction of their strength, the "transmutative schicksalss.""Comparing the static situation at Munich to that in Germany before the advance, Dittmer pointed out that Allied hopes for a "second Armageddon" were not justified, because the strength was being worn down on both sides and that the Germans now had ample reserves at their disposal (GEO 1945).

A "Review of the Situation" by Dr. Otto Krieg considered the problem of Bolshevism, which, he said, has been responsible for 11 wars since 1917 and therefore has been a distinct danger to the world. Now, Dr. Krieg said, Bolshevism reigns even in countries occupied by the Anglo-Americans and they defend themselves with the thought that "after they defeat us, the brave fight us against Bolshevism, they will then be able to lead Bolshevism itself."

Transmissions for the European press quoted an editorial from the Politischer Beobachter by Reinhardt Schenk, in which he stated that the desire of the Allies to crush the power of Germany had been the cause of the present war. Quoting several British witnesses, the allegedly had confirmed that Britain's program was the destruction of Germany, he said: "None of these witnesses can deny that Adolf Hitler wanted peace."

Schenk went on to point out that not only National Socialists, but all German carry the responsibility of the war, and that the only alternative remaining to us is to fight and thereby be able to live, or to go down all together."

Air War: Heavy damage to several cities on both sides of the Rhine as a result of Monday's raids by Allied bombers was admitted in all German transmissions. Extensive destruction was caused in Cologne and Koblenz by American bombers, particularly in the residential districts, according to the communiqué, while British planes during the night struck Freiburg in Baden and Dresden-Hofheim, "causing a great number of casualties and considerable damage to buildings." (German communique, DAS KELL 1929; Franco-American force 1911). Best reports announced the destruction of 19 Allied planes, but the American broadcast claimed that 20 enemy aircraft, 61 of them four-engined bombers, had been shot down (GEO 1946).

Meanwhile, German reports gave considerable play to the explosion at Burton-on-Trent in England, which was said to have resulted in the death of 422 persons. The explosion occurred at an ammunition dump, and it was stated that devastation was caused over a large area. Best transmissions called the explosion "horrible," but the report for European press added it was due to "shelling with the German TEUERE." Burton-on-Trent is located approximately 120 miles northeast of London.
to the personal and material superiority of the enemy, Gen. Dittmer declared last night in a radio talk to the home audience.

Presenting a candid picture of the situation along the western front, Dittmer stated that in the southern sector the Allies had been successful because their attacks were made against positions that had not yet been re-fortified to meet the blow. On the other hand, he said, in the north the enemy's superiority was not by a "strength of resistance which so far has been strong enough to prevent him from gaining any operational success."

"What has been proved in the course of the operations on the southern wing of the front is the fact that we are still standing between the "yesterday" and the "tomorrow," declared Dittmer. "What this signifies in respect of the appeti-tions of the conduct of war should be quite clear. We are not yet strong enough to be able to put up everywhere the needed fighting strength, according to the requirements of the situation. But to quite clearly state that not yet. What this means should be beyond anyone's doubt. We are not yet strong enough, but we can become so."

Dittmer boasted that the "interior and exterior re-fortification of German fighting strength" was a miracle that was being realized from an operational viewpoint. He said it was the factor that prevented the Allies from gaining their objectives of "being faster than the enemy"; of breaking the rigid situation along the front and creating a fluid warfare; and of securing significant victories by virtue of superiority of material and personnel.

After admitting the "painful loss of German soil" and the "not unimportant gains" of the Allies in the south, Dittmer asserted that measures soon would be taken in this sector so that the German fighting strength there could equal that around Aachen. Pointing to the terrific resistance and high fighting morale of German forces in the Aachen fighting, he said the ability to defend, then to counter-attack heavily was causing the American high casualties and was the start of the battle of destruction of the enemy's strength, the "Kommunizierung.

Comparing the static situation at Aachen to that in Normandy before the Amerikaner breakthrough, Dittmer pointed out the Allied hopes for a "second Anschluss" were not justified, because this time the enemy was being worn down on both sides and that the Germans now held ample reserves at their disposal (Ggs 1945).

A "Review of the Situation" by Dr. Otto Krüger considered the problem of Bolshevism, which, he said, has been responsible for all wars since 1914 and therefore has been a distinct danger to the world. Now, Dr. Krüger said, Bolshevism reigns even in countries occupied by the Anglo-Americans and they decline ther-selves with the thought that "after they defeat us, the brave fighters against Bolshevism, they will then be able to bid Bolshevism hello."

Transmissions for the European press quoted an editorial from the Völkischer Beobachter by Reichsleiter Schellen, in which he stated that the desire of the Allies to curb the power of Germany had been the cause of the present war.
Quoting several British witnesses who allegedly had confirmed that Britain's proposal was the destruction of Germany, he said: "None of these witnesses can deny that Adolf Hitler wanted peace."

Schellen went on to point out that not only National Socialists, but all German carry the responsibility of the war, and "thus the only alternative remaining to us is to fight and thereby be win life, or to go down all together."

Air War: Heavy damage to several cities on both sides of the Rhine as as a result of today's raids by Allied bombers was admitted in all German transmissions. Extensive destruction was caused in Cologne and Offenburg by American bombers, "particularly in the residential districts," according to the communiqué, while British planes during the night struck Freiburg, Bremen and Breisach-Forest, "causing a great number of casualties and considerable damage to buildings." (German communique: BBC Nov 29; Transoceanic News 1945). Most reports announced the destruction of 29 Allied planes, but the overseas broadcast claimed that 88 enemy aircraft, 61 of them four-engined bombers, had been shot down (Ggs Dec 5).

Meanwhile, German reports gave considerable play to the explosion at Burto-on-Front in England, which was said to have resulted in the death of 220 persons.
The explosion occurred at an ammunition dump, and it was stated that the installation was caused over a large area. Post transmissions called the explosion "hysterical," but the report for European press said it was due to "shelling with the German weapons." Burton-on-Front is located approximately 100 miles northwest of London.

d. Eastern Front: Transocean's Karl Olaus Krebs reported Russian attacks in helicopters and fortification strength in the eastern and central portions of the island east of Budapest. Referring to the island as the center of interest to the battle for Budapest, Krebs stated that the Russians had built strong fortifications there and would be difficult to dislodge.

Krebs also reported that the Russians are strengthening their bridgehead at Apotin near Bolshevik, and that German defenses had been carried out a successful local attack near Sandberg in East Prussia. Of the remainder of the front, according to Krebs, all was relatively quiet, heavy rain and swollen rivers interfering with fighting in the Upper Areas (Transocean Service 1237).

Dr. Max Krull, DNB reporter, failed to mention the fighting on Apotin, reported that the Russians had reached Bolshevik in strengthening their bridgehead at Apotin, and devoted most of his article to general predictions of his nation to come. The following statements occurred in his dispatch: "The eastern front waits in anticipation of his events." "The winter offensive is an enigma itself." "The short of snow in the mountains is only a question of time" (DNB Hdl 2103).

An earlier DNB dispatch claimed that German had improved their positions considerably in the Nato Mountains (DNB Hdl 1215).

German home listeners heard that the Russians had reached Bolshevik in the Apotin area, that there had been successful German defensive fighting in the Nato Mountains, and that a local counterattack on the eastern front had been successful. In the rain, they were told, the eastern front remained quiet (German concave).

c. Italian Front: Although the communists reported "Only local fighting in the Trent area", Italian troops threw the enemy out of a penetration near Galliano. Enemy attacks in the Lecce sector southwest of Florence were frustrated. German oversnared the British attack on Fossa. The loss of 27 of 80 tanks in this attack, it was said, was a heavy price to pay for the small gain registered (German concave; GOS 645).

DNB reported regrouping activities on the part of the British and mentioned also the attack of the Italian mountaineers which reportedly removed an Allied position (DNB Hdl 1725).

d. Political Front: The difficulties of the Polish government in London again are given close attention in German translations. earmarked's failure to form a cabinet was highlighted, and pamphleteers seized on Allied and neutral press reports which were said to suggest that Kolejny may be asked to return to form a new Polish government in view of earmarked's failure to enlist the support of Kolejny's Independent Republican Party, and still Stalin, determined to deal a death blow to Kolejny, may invite Kolejny to Moscow again to enroll him and his party in the Communist lithium Committee (DNB Hdl 9285, 9042, 1219, 1500, 2158).

e. Western Europe: The Belgian crisis continued to fill German translations with lurid accounts of hunger demonstrations, Communist rioting, and bomb explosions. Allied sources were quoted in early DNB reports as saying that Piarot may assume "dictatorial powers" to cope with the situation (DNB Hdl 1183). Breaking translations reported that he had given "special powers" by the Chamber of Deputies with a vote of 122 to 17, and that Piarot used these powers immediately to forbid all meetings and demonstrations (DNB Hdl 1149, 2113).

Giving in first place in an important evening newscast, the German radio summarized the Belgian situation as follows: "Conditions in Belgium are more and more serious. The Belgian government has declared a full martial law over the whole of the country. The Belgian resistance movement and Communist groups have virtually declared war on the government. It is a matter of force against force. The British press clearly supports the Belgians and states that the only solution would be the resignation of the Piarot government" (GOS 2000).

f. Pacific Front: All transmissions gave principal emphasis to David reports that "virginic Titan" of the Donets naval air force sunk or damaged ten American warships in Leyte Bay on 27 November (GOS 1400, 1700, 2000, 2300; GES 1915, 2330; Transocean Service 1254; DNB Hdl 1034, 1338).

One of two reports quoted Japanese sources as noting American disappointment over the failure of B-29 raids on Tokyo. Tokyo was built to withstand earthquakes, they pointed out, so the high-level attacks did no more than give Japanese AA gunners some valuable target practice (GHS 1400; DNB Hell 1817).

1. L.M. PROCHAZKA TELLS: "Two entire armies of the North Americans are about to blazed to death," DRB states, and set the tone of the day's operational reports regarding the northern area of the Western Front. In many sectors the initiative was said to have passed to the German troops, who were reportedly breaking the backbone of American offensive spirit with precision shelling and vicious counterattacking.

Transocean's editor reported that Patton's forces were being held within the forested area of the west wall between Hoxey and Comillters, while Sertorius tried to call Patton's hand by predicting an attempted offensive breakthrough on the relativists southeastern frontiers. Both analysts concede surmise that the Seventh Army was apparently still trying to join hands with the French First, while DRB states that the flank attacks had been disengaged with ease and a frontal attack on the German Vosges Mountain positions was finding the Germans slowly withdrawing toward the Rhine.

Regarding General Le Clerc's recent proclamation about killing five German soldiers for every Frenchman treacherously shot by bandits or civilians, the CR issued a counter-proclamation reminding to Le Clerc and to Gaulle that there are still hundreds of thousands of Frenchmen in Germany and that if the two generals wanted to start some murderous activities against innocent victims, they could be accomplished.

Propagandists could do no better than to run stale stuff through the mill, using the Allied call to the home front for more materials as further proof of unexpectedly stiff German resistance.

Western Front: The pounding of the German front does not give the impression of any systematic planning, transocean's Sertorius stated, but rather of being at a loss as to what to do, as though the enemy were afraid to make any headway at all, regardless of weather or not it is of any operative use to him. Viewing Thursday's fighting from this angle, Sertorius noted that the Ninth American Army, after having scored certain initial success at Limburg, suffered a considerable reverse when Germans launched a vigorous counterthrust. Sertorius admitted, however, that the First U. S. Army was able to take some "local" headway in the Saxon section, and added that Eisenhower was undoubtedly surprised at Houdont's army showing more offensive vigor than that of Simpson (Transocean Horze 1910).

Transocean's editor mentioned the same German counterthrust at Limburg, listed other counterattacks on the Innsbruck-Aachen front farther south, and estimated Ninth Army losses within the last 24 hours to be at least 5,000 men. It tanks, one anti-tank gun, and numerous automatic arms. According to Sertorius, a division division composed for the greater part of twenty-year-old soldiers staked Allied troops concentrations in Limburg and, after a 1-hour battle, forced them back into the Verden woods. Sertorius claimed the German capture of Vennecken, but admitted that the Fourth and Eighth U. S. divisions had been83668 and Kleinhau (Transocean Horze 1910).

Richard Toonlson, another Transocean war correspondent, reported that the floods of the Moos and Wall River have pushed the functions of the intensions they may have had to advance in attack. Considerable ammunition stock and "hundreds of tons" had already been lost by the Canadians, Toonlson stated, by the rapidly rising flood waters (Transocean Horze 1910).

Walter Schmillin described in detail the German recapture of Verden and Vennecken and emphasized what he called the futility of American attacks and the heavy losses of the attackers, estimating that the Americans had lost 5,000 men dead and wounded within the past 24 hours (Dem Mill 1910).
The German people heard through the communique and reports from the highest levels that heavy attacks in the northern sector continued, the Royal Air Force was making the heaviest attacks in the early stages of the offensive. The fighting was reported as especially heavy, and heavy Allied losses were again emphasized (German source).

German forces were given no more detailed information. The battle of Russia was said to have the effect of a knock, drawing towards certain destruction all available Russian armies and reserves (WS 1100). A later broadcast claimed that the forces stated that soon the Allied news communiques would read as follows: "In the house of the Schmidt family in Zacheville the Allies are occupying the living room, and patrols have entered the bedroom and the kitchen" (WS 2100).

A press dispatch created the allies a 100-meter gain in the Dorssenwalder area but claimed, in contradiction to the Transcann reports, successful German defenses of Osnabrun. This same transmission stated that reconnaissance and aerial reconnaissance had taken prisoners and positions in the deep sector of the British Second Army. A later DNB report expressed the opinion that the Allies had the initiative in the: "episode where the attacks in the Mecklenburg area have been halted" (DNB 1100).

Regarding the southern sector, Sartorius indicated that the increasing pressure on the German barrier positions between Saar and Ruppers in the Saar-Mosel area was a fact. He reported: The best position of the British, the Saar-Mosel area, which is often mentioned in the press, was once again secured by the British forces on the Saar-Mosel sector. Further south, the breakthrough towards Saarstein has been narrowed down by the German bridgehead, Sartorius stated; but it will by no means bring an end to the German forces between the Rhine and the Mosel (Transcann source 1935).

Another report indicated that Patton's army is being held in Brandenburg in the Saarland, according to the Transcann report, successful German defenses of Osnabrun. The action of the US 3rd Army, which was mentioned in the last paragraph of the Saar-Mosel sector, was described as follows: The US 3rd Army was only able to penetrate a few miles into the Saar-Mosel area.

The German forces broadcast reports from the front: "The French have been able to break through" (OSS 1000, 1003, 2100). Further attempts on the part of the Allies to advance were failures on both sides of the Meuse and failed, according to the communique, but cost of the battle for the Allies were considerable (German source).

The French forces broadcast reports from the front: "The German forces have been able to break through" (OSS 1000, 1003, 2100). Further attempts on the part of the Allies to advance were failures on both sides of the Meuse and failed, according to the communique, but cost of the battle for the Allies were considerable (German source).}

In regard to General Le Clere's recent pronouncements that five thousand soldiers would be killed for every Frenchman not treacherously either by himself or by his officers, the German OKH has sent a counter-proclamation reminding Le Clere and his people that there are now hundreds of thousands from France still in Germany, and that if the five French generals who were captured in recent victorious actions against German troops, their wishes can be fulfilled. The OKH proclamation closed with these words:

"Under the circumstances it is being investigatated whether in view of the mounting violations of international law by the enemy (the 1st edition of the hospital ships, the continued attacks on hospital ships and red cross institutions, which, according to the circumstances, and have been committed intentionally, Germany should be the future successor to the land to which the German and French convention and all other international agreements about the conduct of war, seeing that they are being violated continuously by our enemies" (OKH 1100).

b. German radio Frank: "Wilson's declaration made the "review of the situation" with a vengeful attack upon Bolsheviks, warning his listeners that no there at the front the Soviet Union purportedly is instituting, the remits Bolsheviks and therefore deserving to be eradicated. Because of this column, Van Osten stated, German are fighting as fanatics so to purify the situation not only of Bolsheviks and Jewish elements, but also of allied news sources. The speaker then said, the daily announcement that the allies, surprised at Germany's retaliation, have hit their targets on the north front and are having difficulties finding themselves for further effort." Van Otten urged that he did not wish to minimize the worries which Germany is suffering because of the war, but a many, having a social and cultural heritage, can look forward to a prosperous and may future after she wins the war. Britain, on the other hand, according to Van Otten, looks to that look forward to even should she win, and therefore Germany will always have the greater endurance, the longer breath, and the stronger will.

Van Otten's statement regarding allied home front morale received good support on various voice transmissions, with the most publicized Allied call for war materials being used as further proof of German resistance and allied expectations that the war would be over before more materials could be needed (CBS 1900, 2200, 1800).

German Home Service reported that the famous North American historian Dallei declared that Moscow would undoubtedly put into operation her plan to deport millions of German workers to the Soviet Union and to Siberia (CBS 1900). An hour later the same report was sent to the German forces, but Dallei had become "the well-known Bolshevik" (CBS 1900).c. Russian Front: Russian troops continued their large-scale attacks in the south today. Yesterday, forcing the Germans to withdraw from Szekszard on the west bank of the Danube.

Transoceanic commentator Karl Bluscher said the focal point of the Russian attack was located in this sector, where the Soviets are pushing northeast from Matoshkin in "violent thrusts." He said that behind "tenacious resistance," the Russians advanced to Szekszard and beyond to the west (Transoceanic Horse 1519). Reports for the European press confirmed the withdrawal from Szekszard, but pointed out that a "swift counter movement" by the counterattacking Germans had already encircled and partially destroyed these Soviet formations in this region (CBS 1900). The communiqué did not mention loss of the town, but merely told the news audience that the enemy was advancing on the line running from Pukhskirken to Szekszard (German conquest).

Bluscher also disclosed the evacuation by the Germans of Erelc, northeast of Budapest, and said the Soviets had reoccupied their attacks in this sector. German counterattacks in the Istra mountains, just to the southwest of Erelc, and unsuccessful assaults by the Russians at the border district of eastern Slovakia, near Rudor, were noted by Bluscher. (Transoceanic Horse 1519).

With reference to activity in the north, at Finland in Latvia, a home service broadcast claimed a "successful conclusion" of the second defensive battle there (CBS 1900), while press transmissions said the Soviets have been reinforced in preparation for a new offensive in this region (CBS 1900).

The elaborate defensive works surrounding Budapest and the city's readiness for the enemy assault were outlined in a report for the European press. It was pointed out that although the population is prepared to defend with every means it can muster, life meanwhile is continuing "as usual," (CBS 1900)

c. Italian Front: Transoceanic war commentator Ludwig Sartorius, pointing to the failure of the American Fifth army in Italy to launch the expected attack after a tremendous artillery barrage last weekend, hinted that General Eisenhower may have withdrawn strong forces from the Fifth Army for use in other theatres.

Sartorius stated that the sporadic thrusts by the Fifth army and British Eighth army in Italy brought up the question of whether the allies would be able to achieve an "operational breakthrough into the Po plain this winter, or whether they would have to rely on the donor German forces there to cushion their real aims."

The main fighting in Italy was placed by Sartorius east and south of Parma, where the British, supported by huge amounts of motorized and aircraft attacks every two or three days on a comparatively narrow front (Transoceanic Horse 1560). The communiqué said the assault in the Parma sector yesterday was "extension of," (German convoy) while reports for the European press said it had broken into the German lines at three points for an advance of 1000 yards (CBS 1900).

d. Political Front: All transmissions agreed that Weizsäcker's new Polish government in London would find no solution to the "tragic Polish question." According to Berlin, even the conservative Daily Telegraph wrote: "...It is impossible to solve the new government with such Hope. It cannot be regarded as a government of national unity. It would be unjust to deny that the new government would any agreement with Moscow very doubtful. In view of the preoccupation of the London Poles, we cannot expect the British government to rely once more for them in Moscow..." (CBS 1900).
Swedish and Swiss papers were said to have quoted political circles in London as saying that the arisocratic government would never get to Poland (DES Daily 1028), and the Vilna and Warsaw spokesmen was quoted as saying that arisocratic will fail because he will attempt to reach an agreement with Moscow on the basis of "the long defunct" Atlantic Charter (DES Daily 1053).

The German home service summarized the situation as follows: "There are two ways open to the London jails: one is to thrash in their lot with the Kremlin, the other is to refuse to do so. Both ways lead to the same result, the end of Polish independence" (DES 2200).

f. Western Europe: Berlin shifted the spotlight of its propaganda on western Europe to France as all transmissions pointed significantly to the fact that the French Communist leader Thorez spoke in a Paris demonstration for the first time in six years. He reportedly demanded work for the 100,000 unemployed in France and the formation of an army of a million Frenchmen. It was introduced, it was said, with a statement which reportedly came from Stalin: "The secretary of the Communist party is more important than the leader of the state" (DES Daily 1215, 1700).

A German home service transmission reported that Thorez called for the birth of a French-Soviet Republic (DES 1230), while German forces reported that General De Gaulle arrived in Moscow "to receive the orders of the Kremlin" (DES 1600).

Reports of this past week's propaganda in Belgium, meanwhile, continued to note that the economic and political situation there was still chaotic. British newspapers reportedly admitted pessimistically that Belgium was a test case for the rest of Europe (DES Daily 1290).

b. Pacific Front: Transocean carried the startling announcement presumably contained in G.C. A. on German publication that Japan is in a position to equip and train an additional 2,000,000 soldiers without endangering her war production (Transocean Nos. 1800).

Reports of the South Pacific Bishop said Japanese ground forces were increasing U.S. air power time from Newell Island by attacks at close quarters, and that they were being supported by occasional Japanese air attacks. Two more U.S. transports were reported sunk as the result of a "Kakuma" air attack off Frederik Nov. 28 (DES Daily 1056, 1358).

In China, the Japanese were said to be continuing their advance along the Wuhan-Hankow railway. The railway was reported cut by the Japanese air force near Chiang-k’iang (DES Daily 1121).

Von Oesen urged that he did not wish to minimize the worries which Germany is suffering because of the war, but Germany, having a social and cultural heritage, can look forward to a prosperous and happy future after she wins the war. Britain, on the other hand, according to Von Oesen, has not to look forward to even should she win, and therefore Germany will always have the greater endurance, the longer breadth, and the stronger will.

Von Oesen’s statement regarding allied home front reports received good support on various voice transmissions, with the much-publicised allied call for more materials being used as further proof of German resistance and allied expectations that the war would be over before more materials would be needed (GBO 2000, 2000, 2000, GBO 1900, 1900).

German home reports reported that “the famous North-American historian” Dally declared that Moscow would undoubtedly get into practice her plan to deport millions of German workers to the Soviet Union and to Siberia (GHS 0000). An hour later the same report was sent to the German forces, but Dally had become “the well-known Bolshevik” (GHS 1980).

G. Russian Front: Russian troops continued their large-scale attacks in southern Hungary yesterday, forcing the Russians to withdraw from Székesfehérvár on the west bank of the Danube.

Transocean commentator Karl Blümholz said the focal point of the Russian drive was located in this sector, where the Soviets are pushing northward from Fiume through the “vast areas.” He said that British “tactically resistance,” the Russian advance to Sárospatak beyond the west (transocean horse 1913). Reports for the European press confirmed the withdrawal from Székesfehérvár, but pointed out that a “spontaneous moment” by the counter-attacking Germans had already encircled and partially destroyed some Soviet formations in this sector (GHS 1900). The communiqué did not mention loss of the town, but merely told the home audience that the enemy was advancing on the line running from Fiume through to Székesfehérvár (Slovak capital).

Blümholz also disclosed the evacuation by the Germans of Eger, northeast of Budapest, and said the Soviets had reopened their attacks in this sector. German counter-attacks in the eastern mountains, just to the southeast of Eger, and unsuccessful assaults by the Russians at the border district of eastern Slovenia, were noted by Blümholz. (Transocean horse 1919).

With reference to activity in the north, at Harland in Dorset, a home service broadcast claimed “a successful conclusion” of the second defensive battle there (GHS 1960), while press transmissions said the Soviets have been reinforced in preparation for a new offensive in this sector (GHS 2000).

The elaborate defensive works surrounding Budapest and the city’s readiness for the enemy assault were outlined in a report for the European press. It was pointed out that although the population is prepared to defend with every weapon it can muster, life meanwhile is continuing “as usual.” (GHS 1961).

Italian Front: Transocean commentator Ludwig Sortierius, pointing to the failure of the American Fifth Army in Italy to launch the expected attack after a tremendous artillery barrage last weekend, hinted that General Eisenhower may now withdraw strong forces from the Fifth Army for use in other theatres.

Sortierius stated that the sporadic attacks by the Fifth Army and British Eighth Army in Italy brought up the question of whether the Allies would seek to achieve an “offensive breakthrough into the Po Plains this winter, or whether they would look only to the deep German forces there and assault their real aim.”

The main fighting in Italy was placed by Sortierius eastward and south of Rome, where the British, supported by large amounts of material, launched an attack every two or three days on a comparatively narrow front (transocean horse 1919). The communiqué said the assault in the Fiume sector yesterday was “shattered off” (transocean horse 1919), while reports for the European press said it had broken into the German line at three points for an advance of 1,000 metres (GBO 1920).

Political Front: All transmissions agreed that unanswerable new Polish government in London would find no solution to the “tragic Polish question,” according to Berlin, even the conservative Daily Telegraph wrote; “...It is impossible to satiate the new government with small help. It cannot be regarded as a government of national unity. It would be stupid to deny that the new government would any agreement with Moscow very doubtful. In view of the philippinbadness of the London Police, one cannot expect the British government to try even more for than in Moscow...” (GBO 1919).
1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Slight progress toward the east has been made by the American troops, but at the cost of extremely heavy casualties, according to the German military analysts. Figures placed Allied losses at 30,000 men for the advance of seven miles in the Arnhem sector.

Heavy fighting was reported continuing in the northern part of the western front, with the focal points at Duren and the Harrisenberg forest. The term of Duren was said to have been captured by Allied artillery assaults.

In the southern sector, General Arnhem continued to exert pressure on the line between Firebrook and Arnhem. The Germans claimed the recapture of the town of Arnhem on the road to Southampton.

Dr. Schröder, in a "Review of the Situation," accused Prime Minister Churchill of a "war monster" and a "war criminal." He blamed Churchill for continuing the war and said the world's end would see the end of Britain as a world power. Dr. Schröder pointed out that America and Belgium already were selling side by side and that Britain was a "fifth wheel of the carriage."

Other reports to the home front attempted to show that the courage and devotion to duty of the German soldier were the reasons for Germany's ability to hold out against the enemy's material superiority.

3. Western Front: A picture of fierce fighting in the Arnhem area on ground already plowed up by tens of thousands of shells was presented during the past 24 hours by the German military commentators.

The war reporter, Alex Schellings, admitted "an iron territorial gains toward the east," but was quick to point out that the average hourly advance was only 10 meters and that even this progress was made at the cost of extremely heavy losses, according to Schellings' theme that Germany now offers a "front without a retreat." Schellings explained how likewise sufficient supplies of ammunition were reaching the artillery, and how the concentrated artillery forces were in turn creating a 100,000 power of the Allied attack. On the other hand, he added, Allied supplies are held up because the "very skillfully mined Schacht artillery" allows only slight use of the antwerp port and because German V-fries on the roads there hamper operations. (Deb Holl 1956)

The focal points of the swelling battle in the northern sector of the front were located by Transocean's Guider Nuck in the Dutch forest villages of Geurinken and Kleinhagen, southeast of Duren. It said German forces had made a penetration to the limit as made the previous day by the American First Army (Transocean Verso 1106).

The devastating effect of the American artillery barrages on the town of Duren was described by Transocean's war reporter, Eric Wihe, who said that as a walking through the town he could not find "a single house that still had its windows intact." Wihe stated that during the course of the battle the town was still under German hands, but that all the civilians were evacuated. Pointing out that the number of German artillery at Duren is probably the highest at any single point in the course of the war, Wihe said he asked the American commander who occupied the town of Duren whether German artillery could cause Allied fire with the same strength. The reply reportedly was: "To have an enemy near here is the Allies, though we are less extravagant with ammunition." (Transocean Verso 1210).
Only a generalized picture of the fighting was offered in the communiqués. It said the Americans continued their "stubborn attacks" east of Aachen, despite heavy losses, and claimed the Germans took several hundred prisoners in counterattacks west of Julich. Dozens of British formations in the Hürtgen region in southeastern Holland were reported disabled by the fire of German batteries (German encom).

In a review of the fighting at Aachen, a home service broadcast announced that the Allies lost 30,000 men during their advance of seven miles. The broadcast also reported that German troops yesterday repelled numerous counterattacks at Julich, a suburb west of Aachen near farm and caused the British heavy losses in battle off their attempts to take up bridgeheads on the west bank of the river (CBS 1600, 23 Nov).

The same details were reported in the same broadcasts, with the addition of the fact that in fighting at the Hürtgen Forest the next few days four Allied regiments have been "completely annihilated." (CBS 2120).

The Associated Press reported that General Eisenhower has ordered British reinforcements into the Aachen fighting area to "fill the breaches caused by heavy losses." Seventeen Allied divisions were reported engaged in action and a half kilometers wide and a half kilometers deep. Allied losses were said to be three times as high in the Hürtgen Forest as they were in the first." (AP 1111, 23 Nov).

The same reports noted early in the day that German paratroops took the initiative on the western, counterattacking near Julich and Euskirchen and taking 500 prisoners (AP 1111). Later, however, they pointed out that "American strength and aerial superiority" had forced the enemy to retreat.

The German army said it had been able to take the town of Elsen, northeast of Nienrade (AP 1111, 23 Nov).

"Sporadic fighting on the southern sector of the western front," Transcücken's dispatches reported, "strenuous efforts that the most important Allied push would develop toward the German front from the northwest. The American Third Army and the left wing of the American Seventh Army were "placing their pressure" in this direction, and "countered with the probability of a Patton drive through the area." Despite certain information of American advance from certain fortifications on the line between Elsen and Sprockhövel, one is here inclined to believe that General Patton sincerely intends to take an offensive breakthrough in the near future," he said.

"Sporadic fighting in the Hürtgen Forest" is "disastrous," stated the American army's report, saying that American attacks between Bastogne and Liège have taken the ridge of the forest. "We also continued, however, that the Allies have made little progress in the area of the Vesle in the area of the Valley of the Vesle, but said neither the Americans nor French could take any heavy losses."

Another North, another Transcücken's dispatchstated, "placed great importance on the Patton drive between Bastogne and Liège, indicating that American troops have penetrated into the area of the valley, and that Patton is now being forced to invade the form of continued attacks by heavy losses (American front)."

The communiqué added that the Germans still hold at Bastogne and in the forest of the Vesle, numbering in thousands in counterattacks near Bastogne. It also reported that the Allies had broken through in several places north of Aachen, in the form of continued attacks by heavy losses (American front).

The communiqué added that American troops failed at Huy, but in the form of thousands in counterattacks near Bastogne. It also reported that the Allies had broken through in several places north of Aachen, in the form of continued attacks by heavy losses (American front).
positions north of Straßburg, west of Colmar and north of Mulhouse also was claimed. It was said that 100 enemy tanks were knocked out near Mulhouse (CBS 1600, 2200).

The Forces broadcast claimed that the Third Army was continuing its advance on the Lorraine front, but said it had not yet reached "our main defensive positions" (CBS 21 OL).

According to transmissions for the European press, the Third Army opened a drive between Sarrebourg and Saarlautern, after being stopped at the Schleswig blocking position on the Saar and Saar River. It was disclosed that most of Saarlautern, the Americans "from German civilians in front of them to catch the bullets and harass German defense."

Detailing the fighting along the southern front, the press reports said both attacks were repelled near St. Mihiel; American infantry and tanks penetrated a blocking position southeast of Bagnoy, then were driven back in a counterattack; one of the Saar River penetrations,陶斯 continued toward Krain and a strong unit that advanced across the Saar west of Schleiden was almost "entirely destroyed," a penetration between the Claus and Saar was overrun by German troops; and bloody fighting continued at Mulhouse (Ste Binh 1/15, 1927, 2004, 1930).

The proclamation by British General Liddell that five German soldiers will be shot as hostages for every French soldier killed by civilians in German territory was labeled "a incredible violation of international law" by a high-ranking German spokesman. Liddell was quoted as saying that he would take the hostages from war prisoners of war. The spokesman promised that the German government will give very special attention to this matter (Ste Binh 1956; European News 16/56).

A French broadcast centered on the "restoring" of German civilians in terms taken by the Allies. It said many houses were cleared for the troops; special courts were set up because of the great increase in arrests; food and coal supplies were confiscated and that soldiers had been stolen; food and then sold it at high prices (CBS 2100).

G. CENER HORN FRANK: The theme of Britain's desire as a world power received new emphasis yesterday in a "Review of the Situation" by Dr. Schering, who based his comments on the British White Paper published the previous day.

Dr. Schering maintained that the present war is being continued by the Axis-American and German fronts. Although the war's end will at last come, the end of the British Empire. He attempted to prove this by showing that "America's Imperialism and Bolshevism" are everywhere reaping their reward. While Britain remains the "pivot of the world." The war's end, and all that it can do, will be achieved by the 70th birthday of the Allies, for the sacrifice of "many new wars and new blood."

The courage of the German soldier and the steadfast resistance of the German homeland were cited as the reasons for Britain's troubles. Quoting General Sir Arthur's statement that the "man in the street" is also fighting, he said, "young and old fought fanatically, the troops were well equipped and prisoners confirmed their conviction in German victory," Dr. Schering concluded by saying "everything new depends on us. It is our duty to take the initiative to act to restore our countries, particularly as far as the Eastern European countries, because they are really our world's cities." (CBS 1235)

Continuing the line projected by Dr. Schering regarding the bravery and devotion to duty of the German soldier, stories from the front highlighted many of yesterday's progress for the home audience. They purported to show that not only the courage but the spiritual strength and readiness to fight for the fatherland displayed by the German soldier were the reasons why Germany had become able to overcome the material superiority of the enemy.

A report that a third German soldier died west of Europe had used his gun to drive his machine gun became widely circulated with the words: "Yes, even then he did not give up. This kind of fighting is more for bloody losses to the enemy, because they are not the only way to stop him.

The correspondent Werner Bibrowski has quoted an enabling "heroes of the hour" the young fighter pilots who "prove themselves again and again into the numerically superior enemy forces and take a heavy toll of the raiders."

The determination to withstand the enemy onslaught was expressed by a German officer with having held for so long the allied push in the St. Petersburg area, "The enemy attacked with a vast superiority of material, but had not figured with the determination of the German soldier," the officer said. "The enemy lost whole regiments and in many companies only three men were left in battlles for insignificant villages. The ability to hold the superior army is an opre of the bravery of the German soldier" (CHS 1790:1980).

A second attempt by a Dr. Gombold in "The Reich" attempted to prove that German news agencies were presenting the news more honestly and more straightforwardly than the enemy.

"No bring the good news with the bad in a much bolder way, which is not quite as sentimental as that of our factions, but much more dependable," declared Dr. Gombold. "Assuring that in the United States the people must after wait a year for a new report and then it is 'incomplete and mixed up'" he said. "The German war policy trust the German people, and that is something the enemy's war policy does not do. Our reports about the war are as factual and objective as they are true. In most cases we leave it to the people to form an opinion about the war and its problems. Any other way would be impossible in Germany."

c. Eastern Front. A lengthy dispatch by DNB's Wolfgang Kuechler went into detail about the preparations of the Russians for a new attack upon East Prussia. According to Kuechler, as so much the weather permitted and the desired front has not in, Russia will throw into the battle much greater forces than those employed in the first East Prussian battle. Russian troops have been withdrawn from Latvia and estonia, Kuechler stated, and besides concentrations of artillery and tank corps, their greatest asset will be 1,356 planes equipped with the very latest and latest novelties.

German reinforcements have been added and are ready, but Kuechler claimed that the main German defense will again be the knowledge that German soil is at stake (DNB 1900).

German voice transmissions spoke of successful defense in the areas of Benekitsir, Isdak, and in eastern Siberia. Benekitsir was reported as still in German hands (Gromen compus; GHS 1900, 1100, 3100; GHS 2200). Kuechler reported the Russian failure in the "second battle of the Kursk," in which 70 Soviet infantry divisions and numerous tank formations were again reportedly repulsed by staunch German defenders (Gromen compus; GHS 2200; Viscor 2300; GHS 1900).

Press dispatches also highlighted the Soviet defensive victory in the Kursk (DNB Hall 1900, 1910), and disagreed regarding the results of the battle north of the Donetz estuary in southern Hungary. One transmission stated that the Soviets had forced themselves to take the town of Podolensk (DNB Hall 1900), but a later dispatch claimed that both Russian infantry divisions, two mechanized corps, and five to six tank brigades had been stopped three kilometers west of the town (DNB Hall 1920).

d. Italian Front. The comunque reported two German offensive actions on the Italian front. The one of them stopped up Allied penetration points at Monte Baldozer and southeast of Verone, while another, carried on by German paratroopers west of Lake, captured many soldiers. On the Franco-Italian border the Allies were said to have suffered heavy casualties in local battles at Monte Cenis (Gromen compus).

DNB agreed with the comunque about the German offensive action (DNB Hall 1920), but German forces were told that there had been a pull in the Italian fighting (DNB 2100).

e. Political Front. Berlin's propaganda on the difficulties of the Polish government in London was given new impetus with the news that Kra- pinski had finally failed to find a cabinet and that Toms Dreiszowski was given the chancellery (DNB Hall 1900). Recently returned from Poland, where he had held the underground movement, Dreiszowski was said to be better than Szkolczyk and Kwapinski and their "old front followers" because he was a man of action, but Berlin was quick to point out that he was "an anti-Russian and anti-German" (DNB Hall 1930). After noting that Kwapinski was given a minor portfolio in the new cabinet, Berlin quoted Dreiszowski as saying that the goal of his government was to bring about a "friendly understanding with Moscow" but noted that he also "reminded the world of the second principle of the Atlantic Charter, according to which no territorial changes were to take place contrary to the wishes of the affected nations." Berlin took this to mean that he would refuse to accept the Curzon Line (SDB I, 133, 231).

Moscow and Lublin Committee, meanwhile, were quoted as saying that there was no interest in the affairs of the Polish government in London "because the plans of this reactionary group conflict with the interests of the Polish people" (SDB II, 115). Pravda was said to be still planning up Nikołajczyk, hoping to bring him to Moscow to join the Lublin Committee (SDB II, 158). Berlin underscored this possibility by pointing out that the new reincarnated "coup cabinet" had left three places vacant for representatives of Nikołajczyk's Agrarian party, and that it did not seem as though Nikołajczyk was extremely interested in filling them (Transcaucasian Part, 170).

With obvious satisfaction, Berlin highlighted reports that the Poles of Warsaw have positioned the 112th Infantry, asking support for the Polish government in London against the Soviet Union, and reminding the U.S. government once more of the Atlantic Charter (SDB I, 133, 231).

Secretary of War says that Allied difficulties were routine exploitation of Churchill's "prediction that the war would be over by early summer" and have been "optimistic," and several references to Anglo-American trade-lapse difficulties (SDB II, 1058, 1206, 1225, 2002).

German broadcasts in Russian to the Allied Forces alleged that "mistakes upstairs" had helped to bring about a shortage in Allied supplies and reinforcements, but suggested that strikes and the inclinations of Moscow agents in England were the principal factors (GES 1399).

2. Western Europe: Allied difficulties in Western Europe continued as Desert Fox appeared in all corners commanded me. Berlin reported that "important changes in the composition of the Belgian government are to be expected shortly," because "Hitler has been blackmailed into including leaders of the resistance and leftist elements" in his government (Transcaucasian Part, 272; SDB II, 1368). Typical of the treatment this news was given in German here and fore a propagandist such as the report: "Soviet agents disguised as a Comintern leader in Berlin, and now the Führer regime has had to agree to take care of Commissars into the government" (GES 2200, 2220, GES 1000, 2300).

3. Air War: Routine references to the devastating effect of V weapons ended nothing new to Berlin's air war propaganda. American prisoners of war were said to have detailed the extensive damage the V weapons caused in London, and were quoted as saying that the Poles were much worse than the London "Hilton" (GES 1230, 1400, 1700, 2000, 2200; GES 1000, 1900, 2300).

Typical of reports of Allied air activity, meanwhile, was: "Protested by heavy cloud cover, North American and British terror raiders attacked areas northeast Germany. Deceit was caused, particularly in the residential districts, of the towns of Hanover, Raur, and Portbando. During last night, nuisance raids were directed over Hanover and the southwestern parts of the region (GES 1400, 2200).

4. Pacific Front: Small formations of 12-20 bombers based in the Philippines again attacked the Tokyo area on the night of 23 November, according to an announcement of Imperial Headquarters. Japanese sources stated that installations of no importance were hit and that fires were immediately extinguished. In condemning the Japanese people for their quick and callousness, the Japanese Prime Minister stated, "Many terror raids only into the Japanese people were determined to fight, and they will take revenge for the honor and Japan that has been upon them." (GES 1500; GES 0251, 0252).

Other highlights of the Docks news were these:

The U.S. 33rd and 52nd Divisions on Leyte were reported cut off from their rear communications (GES 2000).
Quoting the Chicago Daily Tribune, German reconnaissance reported that U.S. soldiers stationed in the Pacific have no illusions any more about the end of the war being in sight, a deep spiritual depression has set in, and their morale has dropped to the bottom (GHS 2002; Transcript Morse 1306).

Although no solution has yet been reached, negotiations between the Chinese Government and Chinese Communists continue (GSH Bell 1307; Transcript Morse 1308).

1. RADIO PROPAGANDA-TUNNELS: Contradictory reports concerning Germany's position in the war on the western front were offered yesterday to the German home audience and the European press.

While home broadcasts advocated the line that Germany has passed the danger point as a result of the successful defense against the Allied offensive, the War Ministry concurred. Dr. Max Krull stated that the recent decrease in the intensity of allied attacks did not mean the imminent end of the drive.

The confident theme that the turning point has been passed was expressed by several commentators. Hans Krüselö described the new moral strength of the people and the means of modern weapons not Existing to the front; Dr. Hans Hertel hailed the "victory" of the German position in halting the Allied offensive, and Dr. Ley, in a recent report in "Der Macht," stated that "the enemy has missed his chance while Germany was made safe use of her time."

Almost as if to counteract the effect of these broadcasts, Dr. Krull declared emphatically that despite the enemy's numerous difficulties, "one cannot underestimate the strength of this resource and the power of his political means which enable him to create signs of fatigue."

On the northern sector of the western front, all transmissions admitted the Allied capture of Liévin on the lower Seine. In the south, General Patton's Third Army was reported to have advanced to the Somme river between Arras and Saint-Leu, and the Seventh Army was said to have entered the southern part of Lorraine.

3. Eastern Fronts: In a statement directly contradicting to confident reports issued during the day to the home audience, War Ministry correspondent Dr. Max Krull stated last night that the current weakening of strong enemy attacks did not mean the imminent end of the Allied offensive.

While home broadcasts stressed the fact that the enemy offensive has been "mouthing" and Germany can assert the turning point in the war, Dr. Krull declared: "To put it bluntly: the main problem of the enemy, no matter how much chaotic conditions in the rear hinder his communications, one cannot underestimate the strength of his resources and the power of his political means which enable him to create signs of fatigue."

Attributing the weakening of strong Anglo-American attacks to heavy losses, Dr. Krull was quick to point out that with new reinforcements and new materials pouring into steadily the Allies were nevertheless always continuing their attempted advance. He said many units assigned to Normandy in June have suffered great "work and time" since that time, and in some cases their machine has been damaged 100 percent. The light- and medium bombers are sent forward in record numbers to the home forces, said Dr. Krull.

After stating that the immediate goal of the Allies is to occupy the western bank of the Seine, Dr. Krull concurred Allied success along these lines with the capture of Lisieux, a village situated a connection to the river. He adds, however, that the village was taken at the "cost of many thousand dead" (11,100 killed).

The growing strength of German conditions on the western front was credited by Dr. Max Krüselö to the coordination in some nation of artillery attacks, asserting that German artillery fire is now considerably stronger than at the time of its invasion, he said the improvement was due to greater mobility and the employment of the Vólksgahtillery, a people's artillery corps. He maintained that the new technical accomplishments guaranteed a "surprisingly quick and accurate execution of the firing orders," and that now in a few seconds concentrated firepower of several batteries can be directed successfully against enemy positions.

"American observers of war in many hundreds of cases confirmed the tremendous effect of the German artillery fire, which caused enormous gaps during the battle of Auchen," Schallnierz stated.

Scheffler pointed out that the new artillery power, in addition to the availability of continuous reinforcements, were the key factors in the rapidly growing strength of the German forces. He said that as a result the German army has been able to resist the enormous pressure of the enemy, and despite small setbacks has moreover permitted a decisive break-through.

Discussing details of the enemy's fighting, Schallnierz, pointing to the American control of Limburg, the said a "major counter-attack by German troops brought them into Limburg, some miles northeast of Limburg. He added that at Julich one in the forest south of the town from Remscheid to Bonn, heavy attacks were repelled with many losses."

Claiming that the Germans had been able to American armies between Aarburg and Vossenberg, Schallnierz announced that the services were crossing former at this point with five infantry and two tank divisions in an area 15 kilometers deep and 10 kilometers wide (200 miles). Figures of Allied losses in the first 10 days of the third battle of Auchen, which opened Nov. 17, were offered byTranscendental's General ller, who quoted a Bundesarchiv's roundup as the source.

Dead and wounded were listed at 50,000; prisoners, 2,667; heavy tanks destroyed or captured, 1,454; armored cars, 110; airplanes, 646. The losses of tanks were said to represent eight to 10 complete tank divisions, and "reflect a quarter of the total number of Allied tanks at the west front."

According to the "Southwest" weekly, so far, in most sections of which 50,000 to 60,000 soldiers are facing each other over an 80-kilometer front, "clearly a demonstration of German control of the front," ller said the Germans occupied several positions, including Ludendorf (Transcendental, Nov. 13).

Transcendental's Daily Scharon reported seeing Allied attacks between the Aarburg and the Rhine, and dismissed the conclusion of "no operational importance" (Transcendental, Nov. 13).

While the peasants offered no other details, other home service broadcast reported the heavy artillery batteries launched by both sides. One said the Germans unleashed 1,000 shells in 15 minutes in the sector northeast of Saarbrucken, while another told of nine of enemy artillery to the result of the "southwestern German artillery barrage." (German source: 5,000, 1100, 1100).

A German force launched the enemy's crossings, said the distance separating the Aarburg area, Nov. 17, and that of today in between four and six miles. In other force broadcast it was disclosed that a Canadian assault on Saarbrucken had been mopped after the attackers advanced into the eastern forest field of the fortress; and that British assaults on the Vossenberg were repelled (500, 1100, 1100, 1100).

Transcendental's weekly disclosed that British attacks at the 50 kilometers in the Saarbrucken and Neufarben had been repelled, but that near Neufarben to the eastern bank of the river.

American attacks were said to have been repelled north and east of Limburg in the Forest Forest (180 MI, 1100, 1100, 1100, 1100).

On the southern sector of the eastern bank, Transcendental's Bartoszko reported a success of the Allied attack, reaching in advance by the left wing of a German Third Army to the river between Saarburg and Schleswig, said the Americans would not only attack a direct crossing of the river, but also would carry in artillery for main line. Bartoszko pointed out that this opinion was strengthened by the fact that the center of Saarbrucken's line was held in the regiment line sector, where it line open to attacks from the Electric and Seebach Lines.

Bartoszko told the Germanscarrying theention of their forces betweenthe four and main rivers without any identified onslaught by the Third Army. Strong forces on the 15th wing of General Faten's Seventh army were joining the assault with greater in this sector, between Saar Union and Thielbronn.

Further to the east, other units of Patton's main were crossing along the Moder River from a point south of Haguar toward the German Palatinate, 17 miles away. In Central Alsace, the Germans were said to be holding Salient despite vicious attacks, while Tassily's French army was reported encountering stiff resistance east of Mulhouse. The German forces bridged the Rhine at Saarbruecken and at Kalber, further to the south (Transcaucian 1936).

The German line of battle was traced by Dr. Krull as running from Colmar to the Saar border region northeast of the Forest of Schirmeck, south to St. Avold and southwest to Saar Union. He said the enemy was protected by counter-troops from connecting this line to its front at Haguar. Dr. Krull also claimed that after the loss of Belfort and Schirmeck further south, the German troops had regrouped successfully to prevent the joining of the French army and the Seventh American army in the Upper Rhine plain (USN 1936).

Additional details were offered by the communiques, which said the Allies were stopped in front of German fortifications at Schirmeck, on the Lorraine frontier: and that at Saar Union enemy tank formations had been repulsed. In Alsace, many attacks were said to have been stopped on both sides of the Rhine, and between Sélestat and Vosges, and numerous casualties taken in the battle for Salient. The ferocity of the tank assaults in this sector was noted by home service broadcasts (German communique 26/1939, 1930), and force was made to state that in the sector of one German army 600 enemy tanks have been recently destroyed compared to 35 German tanks (GFS 0230, 1930). 1930.

Transmissions for the European zones added that the tank battle between Saar Union and Toulon had not yet been decided, and that on the southern flank of the Strasbourg region the military were able to enter the southeastern part of Salient after hard fighting (USN 1830, 1828, 1829).

1. German High Command: Confident statements declaring that the German forces have frustrated the main enemy offensive and therefore have missed the critical turning point in the war were heard all during the day to the home audience.

The "official" communiqué June 1930 asserted that Germany has overcome with "signal success," the danger which it faced during the autumn months. In a "Review of the Situation," Dr. Karsch hailed the "victory" of the "heroic German soldiers" in winning the offensive of six Allied armies, and in the "Mirror of Times," a correspondent reviewed the brave stand of the Volkssturm at Comines in East Prussia, and boasted that this force is now even better armed and better trained in preparation for the next Soviet drive. At the same time, press reports quoted Dr. Ley's article in "For Strength," in which he praised workers in the army for continuing production in the face of Allied air attacks, and likewise concluded with the line that the enemy has missed his chance. 1930.

Fritzsche asserted that after the enemy had broken through in the east and west, "it became imperative for the German people to reorganize itself and meet the requirements of total war." Stating that the Allies lacked the new German effort so "magnificent," and claimed that the war was already lost, he pointed out that it was the "end of the Allied will" to live on of the broad masses of the German soldiers that enabled the nation to continue the fight. 1930.

The author stated, which the Allies are forced to make in the fighting on the eastern front, would be seen by Fritzsche as evidence of the fighting force of the enemy situation:

Unless the enemy has more than 50,000 men for an advance of between 10 and 15 kilometers, then it is sufficiently obvious that the cost is in no relation to the advantage gained," he said. "This sacrifice would only be justified if there was a great deal of achieving a decisive breakthrough by this means, but this breakthrough has not been achieved, and every commentator stresses the high price which the Allies have to pay for every yard of ground. 1930.
Moder River from a point south of Hagena toward the German Palatinate, 17 miles away. In central France, the Germans were said to be holding Selestat despite vicious attacks, while Truscany's French army was reported encountering stiff resistance east of Mulhouse. The German forces bridgehead was credited with tying down strong enemy forces and it was pointed out that it could safeguard a "slow, methodical disengagement" if German troops had to withdraw across the Rhine (Transoceanic News 1939).

Transoceanic News admitted a German withdrawal to the Saar on both sides of Kanzig, but stated that German fortifications had so strengthened in Chartres region and at Saarburg, further to the south (Transoceanic News 1939).

The German line of battle was changed by Dr. Krull as running from Tolevillers at the German front northwest of the French forest southeast to Saarbruck, south to St. Avold one southwest to Saar Union. He said the enemy was prevented by counter-tactics from connecting this line to its front at Hagena. Dr. Krull also claimed that after the loss of Solford and Feuchter farther north, the German troops had regrouped successfully to prevent the joining of the French army and the Seventh American Army in the Upper Rhine plain (Lucas Wall 1939).

Additional activity was offered by the commanders, which said the Allies were stopped in front of German fortifications at Chartres, on the Lorraine frontier and that at Saar Union enemy tank formations had been repulsed. In Saarland, enemy attacks were said to have been stopped on both sides of Ingelheim and between Karlsruhe and Neimen, and dozens of prisoners taken in the battle for Selestat. The activity of the tank results in this sector was noted in home service broadcasts (German times 11.10.1939, 11.30), and force movements stated that in the sector on one German army 600 enemy tanks have recently been destroyed compared to 40 German tanks (GFP 0090, 11.30, 1939).

Transmissions for the European press stated that the tank battle between Saar Union and Tolevillers are not yet settled, and that on the southern flank of the Saarburen region there were rumors to enter the southeastern part of Selestat after more fighting (Lucas Wall 11.11, 11.25, 1939).

b. German Tank Front: Confident statements declaring that the German forces have frustrated the main enemy offensive and therefore have ceased the critical turning point in the war were heard all during the day to the home audience.

The featured commentator Hans Erichsen asserted that Germany has overcome "signal success" the dangers which it faced during the autumn months. In a "Review of the Situation," Dr. Hans Hertel hailed the "victory" of the German soldiers in the offensive of six Allied armies, and in the "Mirror of Times," a commentator reviewed the brave stand of the Volkische at Saarbruck in front Prussian and boasted that this force is now better armed and better trained in preparation for the next Soviet drive. At the same time, press reports quoted Dr. Ley's article in "Der Angriff," in which he praised workers in the Ruhr for continuing production in the face of Allied air attacks, and likewise concluded with the line that the "enemy has missed his chance."

Brintsche admitted that after the enemy had broken through in the east and west, "it became imperative for the German people to recognize itself and meet the requirements of total war." Stating that the Allies backed the new German effort to "transition," and claimed that the war was already lost, he pointed out that it was the "decisive will to live of the broad masses of the German people" that enabled the nation to continue the fight.

The scrutinizers of the Allies are forced to take in the fighting on the western front were seen by Brinche as evinences of the shifting face of the war situation.

"When the enemy had to sacrifice 50,000 men for an advance of between 10 and 15 kilometers, then it is sufficiently obvious that the east is in no relation to the western front," he said. "These sacrifices would only be justified if there were real decisive breakthroughs by these enemy forces. Breakthroughs have not been achieved, and enemy commentators stress the high price which the Allies have to pay for every yard of ground."

"great things"

in France in the future. The only doubt exists in the future position of France in western Europe. The De Gaulle regime will not find the obvious support of the Soviet if it does not include the extreme left elements of the resistance movement actively in the national development of France. Furthermore, the Soviet expects French support and aid for the efforts of the Spanish revolutionists against Franco" (LIEW 1950). These two aims were stressed and developed in all transmissions. Telegrams reported that earlier was "unhesitatingly regarding the possibility that France may be forced into following an anti-Franco policy (Transcript Horse 1938).

Apparent finding nothing new to report, meanwhile, Berlin covered the Polish version by revising the past week's developments (LIEW 1950, 1949, 1946).

v. Middle East: Berlin quoted from Paris as reporting that Pleket had recognized his defeat. Without comment, BIE noted: "The facts which become wrong through the rewiring of the two Communist and the resistance center were killed by Socialist" (LIEW 1949). Progini in other trans-misions, meanwhile, abandoned the political situation in Italy to focus attention on what was called the acute economic crisis. Berlin reportedly admitted that Belgium had supplies for only 10 more days, and "expected shortage of a serious conflict of interests over the use of the harbor of Antwerp." According to Berlin, the Belgians had expected a vast exchange of supplies to flow into Belgium after the signing of the Berlin Offensive

vi. Southeastern Europe: "Shortly after midnight on Sunday," Berlin reasserted, "all six ministers in the Greek government represented the left wing of the leader and his resignation to Prime Minister Papandreu.
(LIEW 1949). According to Greek reports in the early days of the Gir action, but also been throughout the try stressed that the Greek supplies could not be made. The Communists, Berlin added, "try to organize a general strike in the British in Athens, continue to insist on disbanding the resistance movement" (LIEW 1949. LIEW 1949). Greek newspapers reported: "The solidarity in Greece has been called on to protest that the Greek resistance movement has been suppressed in several sections of the Greek nation and in several other towns, the Greek Premier has refused to put off the date in which some must be阐明s, and the sugar is given. Everything will have to be done to savor civil war" (GM 0949; GB 09/16, 1949; GB 09/29).

vii. Baltic Proies: In addition it only to the German communiqué itself, Berlin reported on the Baltic diplomatic networks. According to information, just received from the Baltic Brazilian Reporters, Japanese aircraft forces were trained in disguise in the year of the American troops. They are already engaged in heavy fighting" (GM 1949). Diplomatic envoys indicated that evidently were the idea to give 10 medals in an important event for the 100th anniversary of the Baltic redoubt. Recent transmissions carried the news several hours earlier. Recent transmissions also revealed, moreover, that the landings were made on 26 November. that only four Japanese air transports were involved in the movements, and that the lead of Japanese had "stormed the greater part of an enemy airfield" (IWM Bull 0098, 1138). A later IWM review of the Pacific situation surveys at length on Japanese successes in China, and added only as an afterthought: "On Leyte, the Japanese large-scale attack against the Americans has not yet begun, but it is believed that Japanese preparations are almost complete" (IWM Bull 134).
The Japanese radio itself, meanwhile, reported that the American 14th and 34th divisions had been cut off on Leyte and were suffering heavy losses (Radio Tokyo, 10/30). These same divisions were reported cut off and mutilated two weeks ago.

1. FRIEDRICH'S NEWS: The admission that the Battle of Achern was "losing ground" might prove costly for the Germans and prove yesterday by CREMER reporter Alex Schellhus, to say quick to point out, however, that the German losses were "not as costly as those of the enemy."

In the northern sector of the western front, reports acknowledged the Allied entry into the towns of Oeversend and Pleesend, which lie southwest of previously occupied Limburg. In the southern sector, German transmissions admitted that the Americans entered Schalbert, near Union and Scholstadt, three key towns for which they have been fighting several days. Heavy American shelling was reported across the Sauer River from positions between Schalbert and Konsel.

An order said to have been issued by the Führer announced that in the future the Reich Labor Service (Reichsarbeitsdienst) will receive military training.

After police fired on Sunday-service demonstrators in the streets of Athens, Prime Minister Gregory Fanarion warned the "Lifists" last night that they were leading Greece toward civil war.

- Western Front: After reporting incessantly during the past two weeks that the American forces were crossing heavy losses in the "battle of destruction" in the Morden sector, a military analyst finally admitted yesterday that "the battle will be lighter, proving costly for the German troops."

This report, however, was followed by Schellhus's statement in his regular operational transmission, but the quick to point out that in any case the German losses were "not as costly as those of the enemy."

Retail and some missions were made by Schellhus of steady progress by the Americans in the northern sector of the western front. Stating that Allied troops were advancing "rains to rain," he again acknowledged the American entry into Limburg, and added the following reporting communications from there to the village of Oeversend and Pleesend. He claimed that bitter battles had developed in Limburg, with the Germans fighting the town and then losing possession of it early in "bloody land-to-hand fighting." Schellhus also reported German successes in repulsing American attacks to both sides of the Sauer River, and the localities of Grossschin, Zepelin and Uelzen.

In a brief description of the activities in this sector of the front, Schellhus said: "In spite of the interrupted use of field batteries, their superior number of tanks and in spite of their first artillery, the enemy attacks carried out up to 12 successive times in both line strength, did not succeed" (Feb. 1717).

Theocomit added "many defensive battles north-east of Gelsenkirchen with certain losses that were able to penetrate into our main battle area," but went on to claim the recovery of important buildings between Hambach and Konsel. The report identified seven American divisions, the 102, which was said to have carried out the reported attacks in the Sauer region, (armen corregio). In another brave service broadcast, it was stated that "many pressure on the line of the River has increased steadily," and on my breakthrough attempts have been repelled (Feb. 2009).

Reports from the American press mentioned continued house-to-house fighting in Limburg, and admitted that the Germans had cleared the villages of Oeversend and Pleesend after losing a toll of 7,000 Americans dead and wounded and 54 tanks. "Oeversend also was reported at tonight, west of Dussel, the Germans reported counterattacks southwest of Konsel, where the Americans look on an "important hill position.;" and now Konsel, when several attacks carried out by strong tank units were repelled by the German defenses."

With reference to activity in the British sector in Holland, the press reports announced that a special German unit blew up a dam on the lower Maas, thereby flooding the Amsterdamsche road at four points, as well as many other British positions. British forces were reported in action west of Haarlem for artillery fire, but were said to be advancing toward the new bridgehead of airmen in the face of German artillery fire (PTM Well 1115, 1916).

In the southern sector of the front, Schellmann reported that the Americans have entered several new towns for which they have been fighting during the past week. The Americans were reported in the sectors west of Eindhoven; in the Union, there "violent street fighting" was said to be taking place; and in Belgium, there continued heavy fighting in progress.

Schellmann noted considerable activity by the Americans from their new Saar River position between Saarlouis and Saarbrucken. His report read: "Without intent the heavy guns are opening, heavy shells are striking the earth, and soldiers are moving from one side of the river to the other." On "artificial fortifications," their artillery positions, the Americans are shooting streams of shells to the other side of the Saar River toward the German positions." Further south, the Corsans were said to have repelled French attacks toward Florence. A reconnaissance of American losses in the southern sector during the past three weeks listed 30,000 dead and 200,000 wounded. (PTM Well 1537)

Successive resistance against all Allied attacks in this region was reported in the communique. Fighting at battles were reported during the day were said to have been severe at Saarlouis and between Saarbrucken and the Upper Rhine, but it is added that "our positions were slightly pressed backward after violent battles."

Attacks by German residents east of Brabant and south of Luxembourg "continue nightly after five mile attempts," while the line was maintained in central and northern Limburg, according to the communique (German communique).

Additional details of these actions were presented in transmissions for the European press. In the area between Saarlouis and Saarbrucken, the American Seventh Army was said to be continuing its offensive toward the Rhine forest, inside the German border. The American entry into Saarlouis was admitted, but it was claimed that five attacks were repelled in the town of Saarlouis. The communique also said the Germans had reached Saarlouis in right fighting.

In the sector where the first French Army is operating, the report said that because the French troops had failed to cross the Meuse and current passes they were now trying to bypass them from the southeast in order to open the road to Liége (PTM Well 1570, 1915).

"Great Front: In accordance of plans for the total mobilization of the German nation, the High Command (Reichskommando) will in the future receive military training," according to an announcement made yesterday to the government and military in press reports.

The announcement said that all military orders were transmitted in the strictest secrecy versions. In early broadcast merely stated that the German forces would receive military training, while a mid-night home service broadcast made clear that the Allii will take over part of the military training of the nation.

It was pointed out that the High Command in the West recognize the military achievements of the German army. The use of this organization has distinguished themselves in the battles of France, Poland, and in all in Russia, under President of France," the announcement said.

Preparations for the military training were reported to have been made between the High Command and the government of the Federal Army (RBS 7000, 1915; PTM Well 1570)."
With reference to activity in the British sector in Holland, the press report announced that a special German unit threw up a dam on the inner Rhine, thereby flooding the Arnhem-Eindhoven road at four points, as well as many other British positions. British forces were reported in the west of Yssel, except for artillery fire, but were said to be advancing toward the line Brabant of January in the face of German artillery fire (Wboll 1115, 1916).

In the southern sector of the front, Schellussse announced that the Americans have entered several towns for which they have been fighting during the past week. The Americans were reported in the western part of the Rhine sector in a Union, where "violent street fighting" was said to be taking place and in a sector, where continued heavy fighting was in progress.

Schellussse noted considerable activity by the Americans from their new Saar River position between Aix-la-Chapelle and Toul, whose report reads: "Without interrupting the heavy guns are opening, heavy shells are shelling the third, and encroaches our from one side of the river to the other. Being artificial for to sustain their artillery positions, the Americans are sending stores of shell to the other side of the Saar River toward the German positions."

Further south, the Germans were said to have rebelled by night attacks toward Mann. A report published in American local papers in the southern sector during the past three weeks listed 600 locals and 300 soundings as destroyed. (Wboll 1597)

Successful resistance against all Allied attacks in this region was reported in the evening. Field officers were repeatedly described during the day as having been stopped by heavy artillery and between Saarlautern and the River Saar, as it is admitted that "our positions were slightly pressed backward after violent battles."

Attacks by French maquis north of St. Maur and south of Besancon "collided bloodily after fine win attempts," while a French division was maintained in control and un or planes, according to the communiqué (French corps). Additional details of these actions were published in transmissions for the German press. In the area between Saarlautern and Eichstätt, the Americans are said to be continuing its offensive toward the Saar forest, inside the Saar forest. The American attacks into the Saar area were repeated, but later claimed that the attacks were repelled in the town of Saarlautern. The transmission also said the French had reached Saarlautern in night fighting.

In the sector west of the first barrier area is operating, the report said that because the French troops had fallen to storm the Saar and Kurmsk passes they were not able to push them from the southeast in order to open the road to Bullecourt (Wboll 100, 1916).
The speaker also quoted a recent address by the British Minister of Interior, in which he was reported to have minimized the danger of Bolshevism, and to have pointed out that too much attention was being paid the activities of Bolshevism in the liberated areas of Europe. (TIM 2200).

The theme that Germany is proving stronger as time passes while the allies have already passed their peak, which was calculated the previous day by several commentators, received an eloquent utterance in a press transmission from Rome, which created an editorial in our handout.

The editorial read in part: "The laptop in the final battle for Germany can only, on the more lasts, the attackers are suffering, and the border of the Germans defend their destroyed pockets. The more probable it becomes that similar war waged as such as that already witnessed in France will become apparent elsewhere. Pennsylvania, as the difficulties in all occupied countries are mounting, the question arises whether German war morale is not even to be better than that of the Allies (TIM 2200).

Another editorial in the Berlin Allgemeine Zeitung also showed the increasing advances on the German side of the line, and went on to assail the Bolshevist threat to the world.

On the first point, it said: "The enemy has good reasons to try and split the European war as seen as possible. They are trying everything at the beginning of the winter before our winter effort has reached its culmination. For the time we will see us able to hold the lower controlling the last decision."

On the Bolshevist score, the editorial asserted that Bolshevism already is undermining democracy, and that even without the intervention of National Socialism, it would eventually defeat the British colonial imperialism and the American economic imperialism." (TIM 2211).

a. Eastern Front: A mid-European press dispatch announced that Horthy, head of Hungary, had been arrested by the Germans, and that in the northern sector of the Hungarian Front, Miklos had been left to the enemy after he had "abandoned the eastern part of the front" (TIM 2200). The evening Russian communiqué, however, reported that the Russians, after attacking nine times, continued to reach the southern outskirts of Miskolc, but that in a new battle that took place, the Russians had been halted (TIM 2200).

The coup unique, failing to advance the fall of either town, simply reported continued strong enemy pressure west of Miskolc near the area of the Arno River, and particularly near battles at Celaz. The Bolsheviks were reported from the southeastern part of the Arno mountains, according to the communiqué (German communique).

On the remainder of the eastern front all transmissions reported only limited fighting activity.

b. Italian Front: Italian frontiers were told that a new battle has developed north of Corigliano, after heavy artillery preparation, the allies were able to advance a few kilometers (TIM 2200). The same attack was indicated less specifically by the communiqué and in a press dispatch (German communique, TIM 2212).

Communications continued to discuss Russie's failure to form a new government, indicating that Eden's statements regarding Count Storni had helped nicely to conduct the whole effort, even should Count succeed, his government will be without authority, TIM stated, because of the latest refusal to participate in the second Balkan alliance (TIM 2213).

c. Political Front: Dr. Althofen, Austrian correspondent for TIM, devoted TIM 2200 to an evening political survey to the significance of Dr. Goebbels's visit to Russia. Complaining of the broadcast in all German transmissions, TIM reported:

1. There was sent to France to "let" Dr. Goebbels and to prevent France from participating in immediately proposed western talks. Dr. Goebbels would be required to prove in Moscow that Austria cannot return to aids that France would undertake no coordinating with Russia since because she plans to "take up her old old interests towards the east." Adequate proof might be the closing of a Zabul-Tanzak front and the establishment of lines with Soviet-controlled eastern trouble at an European conference.

2. The British, western lines to advance at least a western sphere of influence for Britain, but Dr. Goebbels's trip to Soviet indicates that Britain has lost even in the west. Indeed, any countries, troops to the eastern, and the Kremlin is taken western Europe as well. British influence on the continent last through Britain's "appeasement" policy, her willingness to make concessions to appease the "Axis" powers.

3. Greece's economic and political climate will be accelerated when the 1st of all begins to demand concessions (3200 111123, 0101 0901, 1000, 1000, 2000).

8. Western Press: Propaganda on Belgium lends into routine patterns of voice transmissions found nothing more to report than that Prime Minister Calot had complained to visiting press correspondents that British and American munitions had not been kept up "the point of Belgium was out of date" (298 1000; 298 1000, 1990, 298).

9. The report transmissions, however, reported with obvious results that Allied difficulties with the Belgian situation decided by Britain's irresponsible policies earlier in the week. Propagandaists explained that the resistance movements had been armed in the first place by the British themselves and had been trained to disobey lest they might not like (64 11117).

* Southeastern Europe: The German propaganda agencies highlighted the crisis in Europe in all transmissions. A late 11117 rushes criticalized the Axis powers, which later in the day stationed in Athens, the Greek frontier between Greece and Turkey, shows over the radio, intimating that a signal unit in Greece had been broken. As the responsibility for the crisis which confronts the Axis nations, the said, rests on the shoulders of the extreme left... They are leading the country into civil war with their armed demonstrations, the general strike, and the restoration of the normal conditions of the Axis" (3200 111122).

9. Pacific Front: In Sunday-afternoon, between the hours of two and three, according to reports Imperial Headquarters, 20 boats carried out a raid over Tokyo and Tokyo. Fifteen planes were claimed shot down and two boats could not be sighted. (As to today: 111135; 3200 111129)

Japanese naval forces and Japanese planes based on Iwo Jima reportedly attacked American shipping between Levant and Japan, sinking an American destroyer, seven torpedo boats, and one transport. In addition, four aircrafts were said to have been landed on the coast. The Japanese additionally lost one destroyer (3200 111135; 3200 111140).

A late service transmission reported that the Japanese advance in southern China had joined the railway between Hankow and Kunming. The "French correspondents" in China credited with this statement: "The situation of the American forces in China has become very difficult since the Japanese offensive has not been such success. The American forces are not only well equipped, but also well trained. The American air force in China has had to give us a number of its bases" (3200 111129).

1. "FLYING FORTRESS THROWS: With activity in theachen sector of the Western Front at a virtual standstill, USMC military commentator Alex Schmallfuss declared that the two factors of tremendous Anglo-American losses and strengthened German resistance have combined to stall the allied offensive.

Losses of allied tanks and armored vehicles during the six months since the invasion were placed by Schmallfuss at 7,101, and he said losses in men could be counted by the tens of thousands.

While these losses are far beyond what the Allies anticipated, German resistance has grown stronger day by day with the use of new reserves and new weapons, Schmallfuss pointed out.

The flooding of the area from Arnhem to Eibingen as a result of German destruction of dykes between the Lower Rhine and Main Rivers was credited with having prevented an imminent attack by General von Meffart.

Activity along the Lower River line of the front was reported to have "caused almost entirely," but in the south the American troops were said to have crawled closer to the sea and to have come in contact with the German Western fortifications at Saar Union. It was pointed out that at the eastern bank of the Saar and near Saarlautern in the southeastern part of the Saar, Western fortifications were now the citadel of Saarlautern was reported to be the Germans, later lost to the Americans.

Violent clashes took place yesterday in the streets of Aachen, between leftist (and) demonstrators and regular crack troops. A general strike has started, and local public utilities in the city were cut off. Prime Minister Reynaud has offered his resignation.

3. "Western Front: The two factors of treacherous Allied losses and strengthened German resistance have combined to stall the offensive on the western front, USMC military commentator Alex Schmallfuss stated last night.

Drawing in the hollerned computations, Schmallfuss came up with a figure of 7,101 allied tanks and armored vehicles destroyed, disabled or captured on the Western Front since June 2. He said that taking an average of 1,468 tanks destroyed a month, the figure for the six-month period through December could be placed at 7,500, or that he called the equivalent of the tank corps, "...of the Allies"..."...and probably will continue to eat up the substitute for such losses, there nevertheless is clear proof that these factors for surpass expected losses," Schmallfuss stated.

"Losses in men undoubtedly double even faster from expected losses," said Schmallfuss, "because the enemy faced bitter fights in Germany and not is running on against a strong defensive on the western border of the Reich." According to Schmallfuss could be counted by the tens of thousands, "If the million mark has not already been passed," Schmallfuss said the Americans have suffered most heavily because of their participation in the battles for Tours, he said, and now on the Saar. If they had not sacrificed men and materials to such an extent, their "rapid advance would have altered into broken format," he conjectured.

With reference to new German strength on the front Schmallfuss said, "For many weeks the battle has continued in the area east of Aachen, but German resistance is growing stronger from day to day and the new efforts of the German nation and the employment of new reserves and weapons can be felt on the front, where the American advance with 24 to 25 divisions has been stalled."

Schmallfuss minced no words further south, stating, "The Third American Army finally advanced up to the Saar, but now it stands before its hardest task, the approach to the real German defensive positions. It is true the American and Galliaic units gained ground in Alenon, but our bridghead at Colmar on the west bank of the Rhine is more than 25 miles long and 10 miles deep. Even if it could be narrowed down, the enemy could not have achieved anything significant, for a world war is not decided on a secondary battlefield."

In his operational report, Schmittman dismissed the fighting in theachen sector, noting that the power of the Allied drive had diminished considerably and mounting that the 24th American division had been "heavily mauled" during the last days of the battle for Hindern and Linnich.

The flood resulting from German demolitions of dykes between the lower Rhine and Aler Rivers was credited by Schmittman with blocking the route for General Montgomery's divisions toward the east. The entire region between Amberg and Wijenburg was reported inundated.

A military spokesman of the Allied forces conjectured that the flooding of the critical positions in Holland had "ruined the Anglo-American offensive plan thoroughly, because the movements observed in the sector of the British Second Army indicated that the Americans had also planned an imminent attack."

It was admitted that the German line bridgehead at Vaulx had been eliminated by Army's forces with serious artillery and air attacks, but an "organized retreat was claimed on the east bank (1845, 1848, 20%)

The communiqué followed almost verbatim the Schmittman theme that the impact of the enemy attack has decreased, and that because of his high losses, the enemy is forced to operate for reconnaissance on a large scale. One hour service broadcast said activity along the lower River line from Linnich, to Alenon, and the forest front has "ceased almost entirely," but added that "the enemy will finish his reconnoiters with the utmost speed, since he is determined to force a decision in this area."

Another plan broadcast claimed that Allied attacks were weakened between Linnich and Lunderburg, and that the penetration of an American task division south of Mischke had been stalled (German Times, 0845, 20%)

A report for the forces repeated the story of the destruction of the Holland dykes, noting that the French have filed to higher places where they are being subjected to German artillery fire. The report also listed American casualties in the fifth and sixth sectors at 170,000 men (20%)

The number of Allied dead since the invasion was announced as 35,000 in an overseas broadcast, and it was estimated that the Allies are suffering an additional 10,000 casualties daily. As far as the Americans are concerned, the broadcast stated authoritatively, "they are suffering their highest losses since the Russian Civil War (20%)

European press reports also noted the "temporary rest period" in the Aachen sector, and mentioned only that there had been local successes by the Americans at Linnich and in the forest sector. The American Ninth Army was said to be implementing its forces despite uninterrupted shelling, with its focal points fixed between the Schlett and Beer Forests in the sector of Mischke, east of Eschweiler.

The report told of a successful raid for prisoners and booty at Linnich; the capture of the town of Lunderburg, east of Linnich; and local American penetrations at Gey and Vossem, in the front line and southeast of the city of Aachen, said the report of American artillery and tanks from the floods between Alenon and Wijenburg, and across three German artillery lines, the Germans took advantage of the situation to regain the village of Mischke, the report said (German Times, 1108, 1803, 1804, 1805).

In the southern sector of the western front, the Allied forces military speaker mentioned that American troops "hit the heaviest losses" had advanced closer to the river, and that at Bonn Union they had come in contact with the German western fortifications. "The military spokesman pointed out that at the eastern bank of the river and near Schlettstadt at the eastern bank of the German western fortifications zone, "there was a two-way transmission. Fighting at the front was listed as one of the four focal points of the Allied offensive, along with the rear seat of Aachen, from the northwestern front (German Times, 1846).

Communicator Schmittman, presenting details of the fighting in the southern sector, said: "Here to Aldenhoven, where heavy losses on both sides, has resulted in the German capture of the hill of Aldenhoven."

Allied penetrations were touched between the Huns and Schlettstadt, and reports again between Ludendorf and Schlettstadt. Bonn Union was said to have been removed by superior enemy forces."

Further to the south, Schmittman acknowledged Allied gains in the Schlettstadt (Schlettstadt) area, and said the penetration was halted at Colmar, on the road to Colmar. The town of Hambachswil, west of Colmar, was yielded to the reported almost complete. The Germans said they captured or destroyed 17 tanks and took 56 prisoners (BT Bull 1828).

The communiqué offered no additional information (German content), but a late German broadcast described the fighting at Sarliat and admitted that in the evening hours the citadel had been retaken by the Americans. This report said the main battle took place for the old walls of the citadel, which lies on the west side of the Seac. German artillery and bombing drove out the Americans early in the day, and then were fought out again in several hours later (B.T. Bull 590, 210).

French reports described the fierce fighting that raged for the Seac River bridges in the southwest part of the city, where the Americans were attempting to protect tanks. After the Germans destroyed several of the tanks, the Americans used mortars on the bridgehead. In further attempts to cross the river north of Seac, the report stated "(Front-2, 0705).

b. German front: German politicians who boasted that the third anniversary of the Armistice on December 31 was the "last day of victory" were shocked yesterday by Dr. Otto Brink in the "Review of the Situation" broadcast for the large audience.

Brink said on December 31, 1929, the Allies had not yet been able to achieve their expected breakthrough, Dr. Brink said sarcastically: "It is according to all reasonable reckoning, the Allies have not achieved the victories by the next ten days."

After mentioning the current situation, Dr. Brink added: "The so-called Allied forces and the German defensive measures are still being fought, Dr. Brink, in his broadcast to the large forces, Dr. Brink, in his broadcast to the large forces, said: "The destruction and obscurity are prevailing today in all occupied countries, through under German occupation law and order remained. Be extreme conditions throughout Europe to prove his not, and maintained the situation in France, "where in Jerusalem there are 500,000 unemployed, a total of 10 percent of the population."

Dr. Brink pointed out that Allied authorities are unable to cope with the "fascist and chaos" in France, and that the country is therefore dependent upon "fascist and chaos" in France, that is, every man is "receiving instructions from his bloodthirsty masters" (Amer. Brink, 1929).

The broadcast that Brink broadcasted is considered "the most glorious" in history, Dr. Brink, pointed out that the Allies have not yet been able to make any progress on the western front, and the battle lines have assumed the character of stationary warfare.

The U.S. Department's most recent figures of casualties in all fronts were quoted at 790,000, which the correspondent noted, is many times the total American losses in the first world war. The report by D.B. correspondent Paul Schell once was quoted by the Undersecretary of the Marine Department, he said: "The battles on the western front, particularly the Seac sector, have assumed the character of a "mess of porridge," for every front. The chaos of the situation is too terrible to contemplate for fear, even for the old man himself has been used to war for many years. (Us. Brink, 1929).

As appeal to the one above 10 years of age to join the formations of the older men, he said: "The battles on the western front, particularly the Seac sector, have assumed the character of a "mess of porridge," for every front. The chaos of the situation is too terrible to contemplate for fear, even for the old man himself has been used to war for many years. (Us. Brink, 1929).

Several other interesting items collected the news of propaganda reports which the German have collected in reading. These included:

1. A news front reporter accused the "marriage of French" to destroy every living thing in Germany," asserting that the enemy will do everything in his power to "break" the hinterland as well as the front in order to force
In this instance, he said, terror was being carried out by the "secret and invisible" low-level bombers "Truth is the only weapon of terror. My mind is always full of resolution, "probably not without the support of the military, since the German military." Our purpose is not only to stop this aggression, but to defeat it and bring about a just peace in the world. The situation in Europe is critical, and we must act now to prevent a possible "total war." The British government is committed to this course of action, and we will not be deterred by any opposition. The Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, will speak this evening on the situation. His speech will be broadcast immediately after this."
Several pro-Greek press releases in the last few days contained material on the "Greek problem", that this was a "typical product of Allied liberation", that the Greek authorities have been vacillating and providing aid to Greece during the German occupation, and that the Greek community provided the "Greek government" with arms and ammunition and have even been shipping the results of their folly (CBS 1109, 1208, 2028).

Radio transmission accredited to Moscow was behind all, typical reports were: "Accordin to the Spanish ABC, the bloody incidents in Athens are of special importance, because Soviet troops may fall out from the site of action. Although they refuse to obey the Greek authorities, the Greek Communists obey Moscow presently without question. Only Moscow will call for the incidents in Athens" (WBB 1224). "The events in Greece are symptomatic of the war between Moscow and Brussels, and the future plans for world revolution without consideration for the plans of its allies, the British and Americans, according to a William-Strassmeyer apologist. This policy can also be seen in action in Budapest, Belgrade, Sofia, Brussels, Copenhagen, and soon, perhaps, in Paris..." (WBB 2250).

6. Eastern Front: The communiqué reported that in southern Italy renewed Soviet attacks on Italian soil across the Save and Danube; that between Lake Balaton and the Danube, renewed fighting was said to have broken out; east of Budapest, northeast of Miskolc, and further south before the Krau estuary, at Velvary, German bomber formations, the unique creation, took effective part in the fighting in spite of the bad weather (German air). The opening ceremony to the Italian press was attended essentially with the communiqué but added some details. German reinforcements and armored reserves were said to have crossed the Russian drive between Lake Balaton and the Danube, while the village of Szolnok on the southeastern corner of Lake Balaton was reportedly given up after hours of house to house fighting. Soviet columns advancing north along the Danube, WBB reported, had been stopped north of Donaustadt (WBB 1725).

The strength of the German air support in southern Hungary, this same dispatch added, was of squadrons.

Other local points of fighting were listed between the Save and the Danube in the western foothills of the Transylvania, where, the Russians were said to have been stopped in the villages of Ardevt and Ille, the "youngest northwest of Budapest, and west of Buda" (WBB 1158).

7. Italian Front: An early morning WBB transmission to the press reported:

"The food situation, the most critical in the north of Italy, to the troops of the Republican Northwest, has been attacked without a fight by the German rear guards in order to save the "valuable historic monuments" (WBB 1128).

The communiqué had reported continued strong Allied attacks from the sector of the Allied offensive, northeast of Rome, said the communiqué, and that "the last attacks against Rome were frustrated" (WBB 1115).

The German Foreign Service quoted "British reports" to the effect that conditions in Italy are "absolutely catastrophic," communiqué still not been able to form a cabinet. There reports apparently stated, Allied courtiers were not arriving, there is not food, and stores, crime, and raids are constantly increasing (CFS 1226).

8. Political Front: De Gaulle's increasing influence with foreign reports regarding his bid to win back many citizens, and make the British feel he had pursued a policy of squeezing out the French." De Gaulle was said to have tried long ago to persuade the British to recall General Spears, British ambassador in Syria and Lebanon, who "brought about the Lebanese invasion" from Lebanon 1858 to the Druze of Lebanon and Pales in the spring of 1944." Poor General De Gaulle and De Gaulle, recently, Paris reported, De Gaulle reported his request to London, but in vain. "This after De Gaulle's report's requests to London were in vain..." (WBB 1128).

Several communiques, meanwhile, noted that "two new Undersecretaries of State had been appointed in Washington. Typical has the French press service reported: "Three Undersecretaries of the U.S. Foreign Office have been dismissed and three others will take their place. Other new appointments in the foreign office are to be expected." There is widespread disappointment in the U.S. over... (CBS 1115)" the results of American foreign policy and Roosevelt is trying to shift responsibility" (CBS 1970).

Western Europe: Berlin shifted the focus of its Western Europe propaganda to Westerwald. USSR military transmissions stated that resistance groups were becoming increasingly active in Belgium as well as in Holland. BBC highlighted the following report, recorded: "General Montgomery has issued a statement in which he calls the Dutch resistance movement an integral part of the Allied Forces. He says that the members of the movement observe the international conventions of war, and terms that certain measures against members of this movement will result in counter-measures. For an official circle, on the other hand, declared that the resistance movement in Holland is used with close co-operation by the German, especially since there are indisputable proofs that they are using the bombings of the Dutch Red Cross in a manner which is contrary to international law. Special measures have to remedy the situation as far as the direction of the Dutch Red Cross in neutral have been taken. The following indisputable cases are notable:

1. The Dutch resistance movement has directed certain groups to use vehicles of the Dutch Red Cross for transportation activities. This is revealed in a secret order.

2. Civilian vehicles of the resistance movement have abandoned the Red Cross symbol.

3. Leading terrorists who are taken prisoner had legal orders of the Dutch Red Cross in their possession.

4. Civilian uniforms and equipment as well as an amount of arms in good condition have been found in the possession of a Dutch Red Cross group.

5. An arrested leader of a resistance group confessed that the Dutch Red Cross is cooperating actively with the resistance movement.

6. The terrorist groups have taken out of a Red Cross car. During their interrogation, the resistance leaders were taken to a Red Cross car. The Dutch resistance movement has used the Dutch Red Cross to supply letters and documents to prisoners of war.

Under these circumstances, General Eisenhower's statement that members of the Dutch resistance movement are the local workers is not accurate by other circles." (US Daily 1945).

Pacific Front: "The military situation in China is becoming increasingly critical." Radio reports in several countries made press transmissions. "The Japanese forces will sweep up and meet strong forces further eastward, which is the junction of the supply road to Burma and the railway to Chungking. The road to the latter will be open, and all the work on the line east of the line from Tientsin to the line of the main road to Chungking will be completed by the end of October," (US Daily 1945). Another report noted that the price of the U.S. dollar in the Treasury which was going up, proved that rumors regarding a dollar was increasing (US Daily 1945).

Other transmissions, meanwhile, noted that Joseph Stalin, ambassador to Japan, had been appointed as commander of Soviet forces because of the "unexpected serious situation for the Allies" in the Far East (Transcript from 1945).

Several reports cited that the OSS Japanese (P-407) were used in the recent fight on Mindanao and Formosa. The OSS had been directed to send one squadron of these to the Philippines, but said nothing about the results of the raid in Mindanao and Formosa (US Daily 1945; CBS 2017; CBS 2018).

By command of Lieutenant General H. H. H.:

MAJOR GENERAL, OSS, Chief of Staff.
1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: The spotlight of action on the western front shifted to the Saar sector as German military analysts admitted that the Saar river had been crossed at several places and that American troops were already fighting inside the preliminary defenses of the West Wall.

Breakings of the river were said to have taken place near Saarlautern, Hallorfangen and Emsdorf. American troops in each case were reported to have run into stubborn German resistance and to have paid heavily for their successes. Battles were taking place at Dillingen, north of Dillingen at Fachten and in Fraulautern and Rehlingen, according to the commentators. The push across the river was described as an attempt to break through the West Wall "at all costs."

Decreasing activity was noted in the northern sector, with the Americans still unable to break out of the Hurtgen forest and to reach the Roer River.

In his weekly editorial in "Das Reich," which is published in Germany today, Dr. Goebbels stated that Germany was entering the decisive stage of the war strengthened defensively and with her war-potential mobilized to meet all developments. Pointing out that Germany's main hope for victory was a cleavage in the Allied camp, Dr. Goebbels said: "We could defeat every one of our enemies if we could face them singly...but instead, we have to defend ourselves against a united mass coalition."

2. EASTERN BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:

a. Saar River Crossed, Americans Penetrate Certain West Wall.

b. Goebbels Sees Hope for Victory in Allied Split.

c. 'Darling' Russian Drive in Hungary Called Political Kneecap.

d. German Artillery Blasts N..W. Lancote River Bridgehead in Italy.

3. Western Front: Successful crossings of the Saar River by General Patton's Third Army and penetrations into the preliminary defenses of the West Wall were admitted by German military analysts, who agreed that this new threat to Germany's defenses had taken the spotlight on the western front from the fighting east of Aachen.

The U.S. war reporter Alex Schmalfuss acknowledged that the Americans fought their way across the river in the area of Saarlautern. A second crossing was completed at Hallorfangen, he said, where the Americans pushed ahead from their bridgehead to engage German troops in the town of Dillingen.

The Americans are trying to break through the West Wall at all costs," said Schmalfuss, citing heavy American losses in battles still raging around Fraulautern and Rehlingen, on the west side of the river in the Saarlautern sector. "Hard to hand fighting also was reported at Fachten, north of Dillingen."

Transocean's correspondent noted that near Fachten and Schwemmingen the attackers had succeeded in penetrating into the German pillbox line, the preliminary defenses of the West Wall, but added that everywhere "they were met with bayonets," Gorman said the Americans penetrated into the southern sector of Saarlautern. It was the only commentator to mention a third American crossing of the Saar near Emsdorf (Transocean, Feb. 17)." In the fighting south of Saarlautern and west of Saarbruecken, between Forbach and the Rhine, Schmalfuss said that by virtue of repeated thrusts the enemy "is doing it little by little on the West Wall positions."

"In Alzey," he reported, "German attacks between Schlettstadt (Selstadt) and Kayserberg, southwest of Colmar, gained ground. German troops temporarily recaptured the town, German. The French lost there last 26 tanks and numerous dead and wounded."

Painting to the clever German defense system in advance that is "binding strong enemy forces," Schmalfuss said this policy of holding down large units "is a considerable factor in favor of the Germans," in view of Eisenhower's limited offensive reserves (DDB Rell. 14th, 1940).

Transocean's editor Plato mentioned slight gains by the American Seventh Army northeast of Togodding, but said it had been stopped by German defensive fire southwest of Maginot. In the Central Sector, Catholics and Bolenheim were reconquered in a French counterattack, according to Plato, while French thrusts in Upper Alsace, west of Strasbourg, between the Ill River and the Rhine, were repelled (New York Times, Dec 7).

Voice broadcasts to the home audience ignored the Saar crossings entirely, a likely program centering on only one front in the Saarbrücken area in which the enemy attempted a crossing of the Saar under cover of artificial fog (CBS 2290, German campe).

In no man's land, heavy fighting was reported on both sides of the Saar, but it was pointed out that "enemy bridgeheads are confined to a very small area" (CBS 2290).

More than 100 enemy tanks were destroyed in the Saar fighting, according to an overseas program, which added that Saarbrücken and Saargau were still not in reach of the Americans. It was pointed out also during the battles in the Saar region, workers in those towns have remained on their jobs and production there is in full swing (CBS 0005).

Press reports added additional details of fighting in the Saar area, claiming for the most part that the "breakthrough attempts of the Americans were frustrated." It was stated that the Germans attacked the Americans from Hillig and then returned the village despite American counterattacks. A late transmission stressed the fact that both American Third and American Seventh armies were being employed in the Saar operations, with more tank units of the Seventh assigned to support the Ninth's drive (CBS 2111, 2121, 2120).

In a comment on the descending activity in the northern sector at the start of the third week of the offensive east of the Rhine, Runnalls said that as the days pass it becomes more and more certain that the drive of the American First and Ninth Armies has been stopped.

Suggesting the failure of Allied plans, he stated: "It was certainly not Eisenhower's intention to gain only the Roer sector. The offensive aim of this November offensive was to break through to the Rhine, if not to cross the river."

Runnalls said strong American tank formations continued to press against German defenses from Remagen to Remagen, but despite heavy losses were unable to gain. "None of the Americans was seen to fight their way out of the Hurtgen Forest and to reach the Roer River."

Eighteen American tanks were lost in an unsuccessful attack against the German bridgeheads west of the Roer River at Muel, according to correspondent Alto.

South of Julich, the Germans were said to have recaptured Marienberg, and to have occupied the Americans in street fighting there. Alto also reported that the Germans had cut off an American concentration on either side of theachen-Aachen highway north of Dusseldorf and that the Americans had failed in an attack east of the Saar, at the southern rim of the Hurtgen Forest. Fighting was said to be going on in the village of Lippstadt, into which the Americans had penetrated.

British troops in Holland were said by scholliers to be suffering great difficulties as a result of the flood caused by the flooding of Lower Rhine dikes between Arnhem and Vijfhuizen. A Dutch government military spokesman asserted that the flooding had prevented an advance planned by the British High Command against the German frontier from the direction Heleno-Vero (CBS Fall 116).

The communiqué added that the flooding had caused the enemy to give up more territory along the southern bank of the Lower Rhine. Comment on fighting in theachen sector was limited to a statement that enemy attacks decreased in strength and number and that renewed assaults against the front lines were repelled (German campe). In another home service broadcast it was stated: "The regrouping of enemy forces in the Lower Rhine area has enabled the German command to take the remainder of our bridgeheads, approximately 160 men, to the other bank of the river" (CBS 2290). A Forces program reported the same details brought in the communiqué (CBS 2290).

Capture of the village of Alden had been confirmed in Holland was claimed in an overseas broadcast as a result of the retreat of British and Canadian troops in the face of the flood.

Reports from Washington were quoted as stating that the United States suffered 35,000 casualties in the first six months of fighting on the western front (CBS 0005).

In press reports, it was asserted that Eisenhower's plan to break into the Rhine plain with incredible losses of material had been frustrated. The loss of entire divisions and heavy tankings in recent fighting were described as reasons for the drive's halt.

The reports indicated that the British have not given up the intention of forming a bridgehead on the west bank of the Rhine, but attacks by the British and an attempt to cross to an island in the Rhine were scaled down retarded. Preparatory artillery fire by the British at Dusseldorf and regrouping of reserves as troops were seen as signs of forthcoming British activity.
was credited with destroying 80 American banks in this region (L.I. Nov. 3, 1922, 145).

Truman mentioned the failure of Canadian units to cross the Dnieper (Transcanian Front 1917; Oct. Fall 1928).

B. "Journey Into France": Germany enters the decisive stage of the war strategically and militarily. The Allies would be unable to mount a unified drive on the Western Front, and the Allies' military potential mobilized to meet all developments on the battlefield. Dr. Goebbels, writes in an editorial in "The Reich.

Goebbels points out that Germany's national hope for victory lies in the division of the Allies. Field Marshal Goering said: "We could defeat any one of our enemies if they would face us singly, but to mention the Allied forces I put them together with one or two of the others. But instead, so we have to defend ourselves against a united Allied coalition."

Dr. Goebbels pointed out that Germany's material strengthening in the past five years has been bolstered by a correspondent strengthening of the will of the people. "On this, our life," he declared, "and this may it be stupid enough to reject it or to stand idly by telling us that we would do if we could accomplish our goal not crush the Reich. But we have no such illusions, and for that reason we are not possible in the effort to bring our national forces to the highest possible level. In the fights for his life is always strength."

Dr. Goebbels listed the factors that he believes are the causal conditions for the success of the war, as follows: the潮流 of German factories, the increase in the production of munitions and ammunition; the increase in the number of reserves to the units of the Reich; the creation of the Volksturm, protecting the homeland at its outer fringes; and the consent at threat of new weapons, "which cannot be discussed in detail in public, but which will be gradually employed."

As a result of these developments, he said, "Germany today resembles a garrison studded with weapons, a garrison which France and itself on a self-sufficient basis."

The important factor, he pointed out, was that the new strength had been achieved under the "indefensible conditions" of constant moral hardship. "The German people are not a paranormal, no risk yet from a moral viewpoint," Dr. Goebbels stated, "but that will undoubtedly come later, for Germany is now working on the problem with such richness."

As Germany moves into the "Living Round of the Fighting," it knows that everything will be doubled in this war," said Dr. Goebbels. "We have made a pair of the best of the time given us by a number of lucky circumstances. We are standing firmly, as both our feet, alike, only round us, but not slide us. This change in our condition is the basis of the new picture of the war" (Od. Fall 1928).

The allies for the conclusion of Germany was criticized by the anonymous speaker in the "Review of the Situation," who declared that "These people cannot solve their own problems, but they want to educate us."

The speaker pointed to the many problems developing on the continent, citing the conditions in Russia, Poland, France and Belgium, and noting the inevitable trend toward Bolshevism. He pointed in particular stress on the pro-Soviet movements in Finland and Hungary and the alleged Finnish arms shipments at the 20th anniversary of its independence. It is pride to be elevated by events, "we do not need to be educated, but other people need it today," he stated. "We have always been able to solve our problems, and without how big they looked" (Od. Fall 1928).

The speaker pointed out that the allies are "so that is can stop up production from cross the border," and pointed out by Reich Minister Eber in a talk, "German railways front in the war, the line of the army in an indispensable part of the spirit of victory." and sooner.

Regarding discussion of right railcar number for their conspicuous war duties, Reich Minister of Transportation said that the war has called forth men and women railway workers who are able and willingly to work "in spite of all dangers and difficulties."

An article in the Weltkrieger Beobachter showing the day, Director of Railway Beobachter said that the railway airfield had attempted to interest German railway business, but that he was not permitted in the spirit of the German railway workers" (Od. Fall 2000; Od. Fall 1110).
Eastern Front: Martin Halansleben, failing to extend the eastern front because of his "stagnancy," reported that the maneuvering of the Soviet High Command in January is so daring that "one has to ask oneself whether the operational plan is not serving more a political rather than a purely military purpose."

Despite his statement, Halansleben saw the operational advance in the large Russian forces advancing on Budapest from the south, the southeast, and the northeast. Stating that German resistance had increased remarkably between the Danube and Lake Balaton, the OKH analyst reported that it was not yet clear whether the Spanish cuartel intended to fight the actual battle for Hungary. He ventured a guess that it might be in the area of Schneissenburg (Seckauerwald).

Meanwhile, Halansleben stated, the remainder of the eastern front was quiet because the war "had eaten up the Soviet potential" to such an extent that they were unable to launch large-scale attacks simultaneity in two areas (OKH Bull No 2).

Transcanian Karl Blechmann reported that German troops withdrew several kilometer along the eastern flank of the column between Lake Balaton and the Danube, but indicated that the Soviets had shifted the factual point of their attack to the northeast of Budapest near the lake area, where, with tank reinforcements, they succeeded in securing a narrow but deep penetration (Transcanian Front 1956).

The communiqué associated strong German attacks in the Lake Balaton area, and Russian attacks south of Lake Balaton in the Buda area, and in the Melito sector (German reports).

While most vocal transmissions followed the lead of the communiqué, German forces were given the Halansleben report that the factual point of the fighting had shifted to the lake area (GOL 15/3).

Press dispatches also spoke of the various Russian drives trying to surround Budapest, declaring that "the battle for Budapest has broken out with fullest force." A kilometratone dispatch also referred to the Halansleben dispatch as the "factual point of all the military operations," but in general, transmissions to the press offered no details further than those given above (OKH Bull 1110, 1945).

d. Italian Front: All transmissions agreed that the fighting in Italy had shifted to the south southeast of Florence, where artillery was said to have been thundering for the past 40 hours. The most detailed account came in a press transmission, which stated:

"By day and night Italian and British units try to penetrate through the curtains of fire and to reach the west bank of the Arno, partly swimming, partly in boats. But every time the German concentration turns the leaded infantry formations back into the river, in which thousands of corpses are floating. Only near Florence, where the British concentrated their batteries, a stronger force managed to cross an 800 meter deep bridgehead, which is under the heaviest fire of the German artillery" (OKH Bull 1700).

Besides stating that heavy losses of the Germans on the Adriatic coastal sector made it necessary for the British to shift their attack, the communiqué offered no new instal (German reports).

OKH reported that Bencht had summoned all his attempts to solve the reception crisis and "called for calm" with the refusal of the Communists to take part in the new Italian government (OKH Bull 1956).

e. Political Front: Although prophecies apparently have not yet had time to amount to the report, OKH's advice for the European press announced that the U.S. Senate refused to confirm President Roosevelt's appointment of Drew, Rockafellar, Clayton and Mitchell to posts under Schachtlin, viewing 57 to 27 against the nominals. Also reported, the Senate requested a strict investigation of the views and qualifications of the candidates." OKH noted: "Potsch was accused of being a radical, while Rockafellar and Clayton were called reactionaries" (OKH Bull 1943).

Principal emphasis in all transmissions, meanwhile, we given to numerous reports from Allied and neutral sources stating that Secretary of State Schachtlin's "strong declaration" in Italy and the American press reaction to his policy in Italy and Greece "caused a sensation" not only in Washington and London but in all diplomatic circles. Propagandists verbally pointed to Schachtlin's statement as a sign of change of U.S.-British policy, and concluded that Germany's alliance on the matter proved that Roosevelt would fail by it all in the end (OKH Bull 1941, 1942, 1943).
f. Southeastern Europe: Propaganda on Greece continued to dominate in all transmissions. "The key evening domestic news cast epitomized the day's material: "The Greek Revolution: Key fighting continues in Athens," the Report) reports. The Bolsheviks have not begun their revolt in Macedonia. All government buildings there are already in Bolshevik hands, and government troops are being disarmed. The Bolsheviks have seized all power in Macedonia. Sixty Jews sent from Moscow via Cairo have been the leading figures in this new Bolshevik revolt. The Jewish Cairo banker News then the money with which to finance this rebellion. The London Times reports that the Bolsheviks intend to stage a great demonstration in Athens to enlist the open support of the Americans. English Bolsheviks have announced demonstrations "in the British government to give Greek Bolsheviks a free hand." (GFS 1400; GFS 1900; 1240; 1600; 1700; 2300; DUB Wlll 0613, 0614, 1904, 1404, 1902, 2318, 1221.

f. Pacific Front: Berlin military circles state that the British offensives in northern Burma have been robbed of its strategic goal by the Japanese counterpunch in Kwansei and Burweishein. "The Burma Road," according to a D'B dispatch, "is being threatened again by the Japanese victory in Kwansei and by the Japanese advance on Meiteng. Thus the British operations on the upper Chindwin River and the Irrawaddy River are strategically without meaning." (D'B Hall 0613). According to Tokyo Tribune, Japanese airborne troops completely surprised the Americans on two airfields at Leyte, Suranan and Tumakay, and Japanese forces not holding these fields will soon have reinforcements from other Japanese parachute formations that descended near other American held fields on Leyte (Trans-Pacific News 1914). Tokyo transmisions reported this information (GFS 1600, 1905).

Other transmisions reported continued successful Japanese air and naval attacks against American naval forces and American shipping in the waters off Leyte (GFS 1600; GFS 0600; DUB Hall 1916).

German sources quoted United States spokesman to accentuate the seriousness of the situation in the Far East. Major General Voelmyer, according to Reuters, stated, "The military situation in China is serious. The enemy has succeeded in recent days to make considerable progress" (DUB Hall 1916). Secretary of the Navy Forrestal was quoted as saying, "Japanese air strength is constantly increasing, and Japanese aircraft production is steadily on the rise. Future Allied operations near Japan and the Philippines will suffer considerably from this fact" (Radio Batavia 1600; GFS 1700).

take offensive actions destroys a number of illusions which enemy propagandists had developed. Today the world recognizes that the German Command has taken the initiative firmly in its hands; that the enemy air offensive could not break down the German armament program; that especially the Luftwaffe has been strengthened; that Germany possesses many operational reserves that can be used to close gaps at the front; that an entire assault army was actually formed and employed without the knowledge of the enemy” (IBP Bull 1945).

Reiterating that the attack is going “absolutely according to plan,” DBS’s Alexei Leonov stated that “certain effects” can be seen on the road of the front in the direction of the American attack.

This statement was contradicted in numerous press dispatches, which had a tendency to emphasize that the Allies still remained on the offensive along most of the western front. It was reported that the Allies were pressing forward in the Limnic sector, and that the village of Bour, east of Limnic, had been evacuated. Another item acknowledged the withdrawal of Germans near Rons to the eastern bank of the River at Eres, marking the first reduction of a later allied claim that the First Army had entered the city of Duren (IBP Bull 1238, 1330, 1555, 1945).

Most transmissions were exceedingly cautious to observe the High Command’s blackout of news. The schematic limited its report to the following: “In the winter battle of the west, our troops continued their attack on the entire front. Through the gaps of the battered and worn American First Army, tank formations pushed deep into the battle area. In the course of a night tank battle, formations of the enemy were repulsed. Squadrons of German fighters and fighter bombers which protected the movements of our troops shot down 24 enemy planes in the course of air battles. On the remainder of the western front, the battle of position continues at the heights existing focal points (German concept).

The activity of British forces on the right wing of the British Second Army was seen as an indication that “the British intend to capture this part of the western front.” This possibility seemed neglected in other reports, one of which noted that British positions in Holland are so badly flooded that the movement of aerial resources or concentration of artillery is “out of the question”; while the other stated that a captured British major said Montgomery is delaying his offensive until he sees the outcome of American breakthrough attempts (IBP 1940; IBP 1940).

Reporting on fighting in the southern sector of the front, Schmalzrusse said, “the hard and bloody bunker battles continue, especially in the former focal point areas of Dillingen and Subiculum.” After pointing out that “reports were not reliable to describe a single success that would justify his losses in men and matériel,” Schmalzrusse went on to state that the Third Army had pushed into the Dill sector, northeast of Bergamont, but added that the penetration was limited. The 14th American tank division on the right wing of the Seventh Army was said to be attempting a deep penetration southwest of Melsch, on the Palatinate, employing tanks carrying “great standards” for the purpose of clearing blockades. The loss of several “bunkers” along the defensive line was admitted, but the drive was reportedly stopped (IBP 1941).

The American drive in the south is aimed toward the German city of Koblenz, according to a commentary by Transsac’s military analyst Bastian of Koblenz. Violent forest fighting was reported taking place north and south of ‘Bois d’Achier’, on both sides of the Rhine River, but Bastian stressed the fact that Patton’s most advanced spearhead stands four kilometers behind the Dutch frontier and 50 kilometers from the ridge of the Vosse Wall. The right wing of the Third Army was placed near Bitche, where strong breakthrough attempts were being made. Noting large American concentrations at the Seer bridgehead, Bastian said reinforcements were attacking successfully by German artillery at Sponsor, while at Dillingen many American vehicles ran out of fuel. In order to protect troops that were preparing to advance the sector (Transsac 1942).

The heavy American attacks against Bitche and Melsch were described in press transmission as “merely to break enemy blocking points” at the old German line and to accomplish a breakthrough. “When the Americans were able to penetrate repeatedly into the German main battlefield, they were again and again thrown back to their starting positions by determined counterattacks of local German reserves, and even when they suffered very heavy losses from the heavy arms of the German machine guns and infantry,” stated one dispatch.

On the fighting in March, reports said an attack against Koblenz, supported by two brigades, had failed. The Americans had their “heavy tank division reinforced” to have suffered heavy losses (IBP Bull 1019, 1235, 1945).
Treason quoted a report from the War Department in Washington listing American casualties in western Europe during November at 58,000 men, including 6,200 killed. (Transcendence Horse 0815).

An American order to soldiers at the front not to carry letters with them that might give away secret information if they were captured was discussed in several transmissions. It was stated that the real reason is that the American Supreme Command does not want the Germans to see that the letters reflect an unpleasant situation in the United States. These letters tell more of the strikes and increasing German dissatisfaction at home than the Supreme Command likes," said the reports (ONE Toll 1926; OHE 2100).

b. German Home Front: Dr. Otto Kirch, in the "Review of the Situation" broadcast on the home audience, devoted all his attention to the present German counter-offensive on the western front. He quickly called to mind the "still serious situation on all fronts," pointing out that "a new offensive, by the Allies, is to be expected, while the offensive activity of both the British and Canadians in Italy certainly has not decreased." He was even critical in evaluating the importance of this new counter-attack, stating that "this situation has changed only in a certain part of the western front." But that "the enemy has been taken completely by surprise" was clearly shown by reports, he said.

Dr. Kirch observed the Allies' awareness of still existing German resistance when the date for final victory had to be postponed from the autumn, when winter of 1944, to the spring and summer of 1945. However, he continued, never did the Allies ever think of the possibility of a German counter-offensive, of the success of such a parade of tanks, planes, infantry. "It has been the greatest surprise; the Germans have all come back, the Luftwaffe, the Panzers, the Infantry. The German intelligence has again shown its strength." He then suggested that it was Hitler's task to give the German people more details of the operations, that point of the hidden secrecy of this secret, adding that Eisenhower too had destroyed a complete blackout of news on the counter-offensive. "But spirit from that," he said, "it can clearly show the atmosphere in the enemy camps.

He cautioned the German people not to overestimate the military surprise, saying: "not only to understand the still weakly force of the enemy, to know his strength." Dr. Kirch mentioned how prepotent the occasion of the German attack was, "coming at a moment when the enemy can fear it least from the political point of view." He indicated the "heretical speech on Greece" by Churchill followed last week by another speech in which Dr. Kirch reported Churchill as saying that Germany must be destroyed. "This is the first time that one of our enemies has stated his formulam officially, in an explicit capacity." He discounted the German plans as "nothing but a personal opinion.

Dr. Kirch concluded his talk with a pot on the back of the German people for the total mobilization plan of July. "Then months ago, after the Allied breakthrough, German soldiers act, on their way back into the Fatherland men, women and children with spades on their shoulders who had helped build fortifications, they have to work too. Today . . . German soldiers are crossing trenches which Germans have dug . . . to stage their come-back" (GHS 1235).

Hugo poses comment on the nature and progress of the counter-offensive, transmitted to the European news service, stressed varied points of view. Major Ritter von Schorren, writing in the Vossische Zeitung, observed that "many soldiers are noticing that Allied losses are mounting, that the general offensive is progressing very slowly, that reinforced German units are resisting more fiercely and are taking over the offensive." The Berliner Tageblatt observed that "the German command has used only a part of its potential at the western front. How desperate the counter-offensive is was strongly implied in the phrase: "Now more than ever, every single man is important." The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, in an attempt to rejuvenate the morale of the infantry, Reich said: "The German people begin to see that its heroism and preparations are not in vain . . . . The army has to fight, the fact that the apparently hopelessly beaten Reich has enough military power to change the offensive battle against three world powers that fought for months into an attack which achieved more in the first twenty-four than English and American army groups with material superiority could achieve in an offensive that lasted many weeks." (DIBI Toll 0856).

American inactivity in the Italian sector was emphasized in a broadcast to the home audience, the commentator pointing out that in seven weeks of fighting, the doughnut penetration at any single point had been ten kilometers. He followed with an analysis of the American and Diller attacks by which he found reason to enter upon a discussion of the Allied military theory of 'depth and entanglement.' Shrugging that fighting for individual pillboxes has been going on for days,
The army has been halted in our pillbox defense area . . . built to a line of defenses which would halt the army by forcing him to light a line of local actions for the capture of each pillbox. That is why we are here, but pillboxes were built. The army was sent to leave himself in the dust of This would make possible flank attacks, and prevent any penetration from being a breakthrough. This, he added, in what a happened, andstommen prior to the German text books. Thus, he concluded, the army has been halted a very first line of our defenses which run to the very great depth (GHS 1934). plan and American press comment on the German offensive released account series to the hearth audience. The new attack was lauded as "the sensation of the Foreign press . . . English newspapers talk of nothing else." That the offensive from the Allies by surprise, as seen in third news in American press, communique says: 'Germany Hits Back,' The New German Offensive In Hitler's Front 3000, 2000.2.

An attempt to stimulate fighting spirit, a broadcast to the mechanic reported toced events attributed to the Americans. "In broken, an ace pilot and ace as stooped by an American who stole his watch. In Hilsdorf, an American soldier fell on a nine worker and robbed him of his bicycle. In Stalingrad, a man was killed because he pushed the American officers by mistake. Our dicussions will have to give the right answer to these American tricks and our weapons 3000.

ote: It, Gun, Dittmer did not send last night. The date of the talk, he did, "will be announced in good time" (GHS 1900).

Eastern Front: Tristanvnark Blomcher reported that German-Kremlin's had reached decisive successes in the entire Russian battle zone. The German counterattacks north of the big Baku cbed and and the Soviet prisoners were taken, between the Don River, the Ural Mountains, and the south side of the Don (Tristanvark 1800). Blomcher's Klein corps and DKB's Max Krull agreed essentially with Blomcher at Mtui, Krull adding that the German command had prepared reserves in Hungary, not depriving any of the other sectors, in anticipation of greater Soviet offensives (Tristanvark 1839; DKB Bull 1900).

Letter transmission to the American press stated that the German counterattacks southwest of Leningrad had carried German troops to the railway crossing just west of the town, and added that, contrary to other reports, the Russians had crossed the Volga's southern border (DKB Bull 1810).

A criticism differed from those press releases only in that it granted the case some slight gains of ground in the area south of Russia and on the Khabarovo road (German accuse).

Italian Front: The inability of the British Eighth Army to "keep up its heroic effort in central Italy" was claimed in German translations. The communique stated: "Operations were halted on both sides of the G and Brancavalle . . . ." One report added: "The extremely heavy losses last week forced the British Eighth Army to such greater restrictions yesterday. They attacked only near Pescara." (German accuse; COG 0626; DKB Bull 1815; GFS.

Political Front: Berlin especially referred to Rostovskii in Stalingrad, in London, Berlin, and in other industrial centers in British and American newspapers reported against Churchill's policy and demanded an immediate capitulation in Greece. "Typical of DKB's attack is a statement which in his "intellectual principles," both a and one of the original countries remains. The Atlantic Charter of the age, has been shattered completely . . . . It is not surprising that the do not know they are fighting for. Continuation of this tragic policy consistency will lead irretrievably to the destruction of Great Britain" (DKB Bull 1820, 1830, 1902).

Western Europe: Comment on the French-Soviet pact combined along familiar Reich press translations. Propaganda agreed that De Gaulle had delivered to the French, and that the pact had frustrated Churchill's plan to form an European bloc under British control. Wehrmacht-Bundestag reported that "De Gaulle is the militarily, politically and economically dependent partner. The flexibility of the pact permits any sort of interpretation. It will be interpreted, of course, favor of the stronger partner . . . ."
he that French government, "the National French Committee of Marshal Petain," denounced the "de Gaulle-Kremlin pact" and declared that De Gaulle was not authorized to sign similar agreements on France's behalf. The puppet government's Minister of Propaganda Laborde reportedly predicted: "One of these days, this pact will become nothing but a useless scrap of paper" (DNB 1020).}

In Southeastern Europe: Late evening transmissions noted that there were Allied reports that the British as well as the R.A.F. were willing to continue peace negotiations, but that bitter fighting was continuing meanwhile. Items through the day detailed fierce fighting in all parts of Crete and elsewhere in Greece, and late newswires in the last round showed reports that the rebels had captured the British Headquarters in the Greek capital.

The previous day's solenial meeting in which the British, in their desperate need for peace at any price, would force the Greek king to recognize these conditions.

In the Pacific: Successes of the Japanese air fleet against B-29's attacking Japan, and Japanese air attacks on the islands leading vessels demanded space on German transmissions regarding the war in the Pacific. In the recent attack on Tokyo, 17 American planes were said to have been destroyed, and 20 additional ones damaged (DNB November 1211; CIB 2600, 1900). "Special units" of the repair fleet claimed to have sunk two large American transports, one medium transport, and one large transport near Mindoro (DNB 1106; CIB 1200, 2200; CIB 2800, 1900).

In a lengthy DIB dispatch, claimed that friction had already arisen between the two newly created British naval units in the war. East and the British commanders in that theater. The British admiral Pownall and Fraser reported, according to a transmission, being placed in positions subordinate to those of MacArthur, and a quotation purportedly from the New York Herald Tribune stating, "American naval circles doubt that the British fleet can help us in the Pacific," was said to have deflected the enthusiasm of the British commanders (DNB 1130).
1. MAJOR PROPAGANDA TRENDS: The growing uncertainty of the German people as to the success of the great offensive in Belgium became apparent yesterday as reassuring statements to the effect that the High Command is "satisfied" with the progress of the drive crept into many propaganda reports.

Denying an alleged enemy claim that the German offensive has failed, MIB's Dr. Max Krull asserted that high military circles are satisfied with the situation in every respect. At the same time, in a review of the eight-day-old drive, he disclosed possible German weaknesses. One of his statements read: "It is easier to ward off counterattacks near the fortified starting positions than in the open battlefield of mobile warfare."

Increasing resistance was reported by American troops, and it was acknowledged that the Americans have been attacking severely in the Stavelot sector during the past three days. The Germans were said to be progressing satisfactorily on both sides of the Ourthe River and to have captured St. Vith in Belgium. On the rear front, they were reported to have taken Dillingen, Rothen and Andorf and to have crossed to the west bank of the Saar River, as part of General Patton's Third Army army north to repel the new offensive.

   Western Front: Reassuring statements to the effect that the German High Command is "satisfied" with the progress of the new offensive carried many transmissions yesterday, as emphasis was placed for the first time on the intensified resistance which the eight-day-old drive is meeting from American troops.

   While it was acknowledged that the Americans held strong defensive positions, and at some points, particularly on the northern wing, had thrown counterattacks, commentators were quick to deny "enemy reports that the offensive in Belgium has failed."

   Latest front-line reports by the Gernans were as follows: In the north, the Americans have established a strong front line sector at Stavelot, where they launched 14 counterattacks in the past three days; in central and southern Belgium, German units are pressed from both sides of the Ourthe River, and have entered St. Vith. On the rear front, the Gernans have taken Dillingen, Rothen and Andorf, and have cleared most of the American positions on the east side of the Saar River.

   The theme that the new Drive is coming according to plan and that the enemy cannot speak of the stopping of the German underathumb, as was portrayed by MIB's war commentator, Dr. Max Krull, was developed by MUS's war commentator, Dr. Max Krull, who asserted: "High military circles are satisfied with the situation in every respect, in every respect, in every respect," declared Dr. Krull.

   Attempting to disprove the enemy allegations that the offensive has failed, Dr. Krull listed factors of German strength, at the same time inadvertently revealing his own feelings of uncertainty on to the outcome of the new Drive.

   Dr. Krull said:
   1. An attack on a vast scale needs a longer starting period before definite successes can be reported.
   2. The attack is supported by a solid base in the west flank, from which new assault formations are brought to the front. However, it is easier to ward off counterattacks near the fortified starting positions than in the open battlefield of mobile warfare.
   3. The majority of German assault troops are veterans of winter warfare, but the Allied winter will add to the difficulties of the Americans. This is to our advantage, although the German ranks are filled with Volksprediger divisions.
The German Airworthacht has been on the defensive for almost two years, "using her reserves sparingly," saving her strength "for the first great counterblow" (DNB Hol 1936).

The same line was taken in a dispatch quoting the military spokesman of the Wilhelminia: "The development of the situation is going exactly according to the desires of the German High Command. There is all hope for solid optimism. In seven days German troops have conquered territory which the enemy needed three months to capture. This takes clear the difference between an offensive led by the German command and one led by the enemy" (DNB Hol 1932).

The picture of the front-line situation was characterized by further reports of large-scale shifting of American fighting units. One transmission stated: "The winter battle in the Ardennes is still drawing all available American forces with tremendous suction power" (DNB Hol 2116).

Evacuation of the Saar bridgeheads by the Third American Army was reported by a War correspondent, Gerard Backe. He accused Patton's army of leaving Saarlautern, Dillingen, and Ensdorf, but that it had continued to resist German attacks at Saarlautern (Terreanese Horse 1235). A crossing by German troops to the west bank of the Saar at Ensdorf was noted in a home service broadcast (GHS 1940), while another transmission said that south of Saarlautern, German assault troops crossed the river and penetrated into enemy positions near Mosel (DNB Hol 12854).

Describing the German recapture of the entire basin system in the fortress of the west wall, Backe wrote: "Patton was compelled to evacuate the Saar bridgeheads to meet the German tank thrusts in South Belgium. The German forces are hotly pursuing the retreating Americans. In the initial phase of the withdrawal, the Americans succeeded in blowing up five pillboxes between Wednesday night and Thursday, but on Friday they could no longer do this because of the German counterattack. The Germans are now advancing so rapidly that they are not only regaining entire groups of pillboxes undamaged, but even capturing the dynamite laid for blowing them up... The evacuation of Dillingen began at 0730 Friday morning, under cover of dense fog and snow.

The claim that the Seventh Army has now also been driven out of the west wall because of the new German drive was made in a Terreanese report. It read: "Not only the Third American army, but also the Seventh is withdrawing from the west wall. On Friday, General Patton's American troops northwest of Hoesenberg began to evacuate advanced pillboxes of the Siegfried line on the Moselle-Saarlautern border near Mosel. The Americans had occupied the city and left it in American hands.

The current situation, offering a generalized picture, stated that the winter battle is taking a "favorable turn" and announced American attacks at Stavelot and across the front of the German army. The Americans' drive in Central Luxembourg, after repulsing the "liberation" of Dillingen and clearing the right bank of the Saar in the Saarbrücken area, the Americans marched into the Saarbrücken area on Friday, December 28th.

In the case of Russia, Allied forces met with no obstacles. Between the Lower Vosges and the Rhine, the attacks resulted in the destruction of large numbers of enemy tank divisions, the Americans and French forces of the American Ninth and Third Armies were behind the enemy lines in the course of counterattacks.

The Americans were also the victims of a surprise attack by the German forces from the St. Nazaire, which "drives the enemy out of his fortresses and heavy pillboxes into the enemy's hinterland." Briefly square kilometers were said to have been recaptured (Hermes corps).

Heavy American losses were materialized primarily for the second consecutive day, with the Twelfth referring to the "invasion" by three divisions and a broadcast stating only that they had suffered heavy casualties. The specific divisions were the 6th, 28th, and 100th Infantry Divisions, the 7th and 24th Tank Divisions, and the 100th Infantry Division. (The 4th Division was added instead of the 20th in yesterday's report). DNB Hol 1415, GHS 2100. GHKP was quoted as reporting American casualties in the past 24 hours of 50,000, and 53,000 casualties in December on the southern front (GHS 2200).

Although the "invasion" of the Allied Supreme Commander, the Gormans said a claim that the city of St. Vith was isolated under the "invasion" by three divisions and a broadcast stating only that they had suffered heavy casualties. The specific divisions were the 6th, 28th, and 100th Infantry Divisions, the 7th and 24th Tank Divisions, and the 100th Infantry Division. (The 4th Division was added instead of the 20th in yesterday's report). DNB Hol 1415, GHS 2100. GHKP was quoted as reporting American casualties in the past 24 hours of 50,000, and 53,000 casualties in December on the southern front (GHS 2200).

Although the "invasion" of the Allied Supreme Commander, the Gormans said a An atrocity story concerning treatment by the Americans of German prisoners of war was said to have come from an escaped German prisoner. He was quoted as relating: "The Americans led us from a celler and had us stand facing the wall. I shouted that we were to be shot. A second later, we heard the American machine gun. I dropped quickly, so that the shots passed over me into the wall. Thrice of my comrades cried suddenly. The Americans continued to shoot until nothing novelt. I remained motionless until I discovered the Americans had left. With a wounded grenade I managed to escape, and we made our way back to the German lines" (DNB 1643).

by Germany Home Front. The military development of a new German offensive was used by commentator Hans Fritsche as proof of the effectiveness of German press and radio reports to the home front during the past year. Speaking on the midday "review of the Situation" program, Fritsche congratulated himself and other writers and broadcasters for their continued reports during the past year in the face of enemy breakthroughs to the east and west and "the treacherous abandonment" of Germany by her allies. He pointed out that the aim of the German Home Service was not to put the situation in a better light than it actually was, but to motivate the moral, martial, material and physical strength of the nation.
Fritsche states that the job became more difficult as enemy propaganda insisted that further German resistance was "hopeless," but that since Germany was able to "stem the enemy flood" and now has collected its strength and is resorting there, the press and radio can be credited with urging the people to be patient and not to lose their courage.

Assuming that the new blow are the result of the German capacity "to hold out and fight" and cannot be considered as a miracle, Peitsche appealed to the German people to carry on with the same courage during the coming year (CIB 1255).
The impact of the new German offensive, added to the disappointments over the fact that the war had not ended in 1944, was asked by German propagandists to have caused the "bloodiest Christmas in the last 30 years in America.
All during the day, transmissions and broadcasts quoted American and British sources to show the moral and war-readiness of the Allied peoples. Typical excerpts follow:
Time magazine: "General Marshall wrote in the Army and Navy Journal recently that the war would be over by the time his article appeared. It is no wonder that the whole of the American people has now let its faith in a quick victory in Europe."

For the second consecutive day, an unidentified broadcast was beamed to the people of Belgium advising them to leave their homes with all speed to escape the devastation of new German weapons. News reported in French and Flemish between 1230 and 1330 on "26:01, 26:01 and 27:01 hours, the broadcast promised the Belgians that speed in executing their towns was the only way to save their lives.
In an obvious attempt to hurry the Allies by sounding the code, the broadcast told the Belgians to use all means of exit, reentry roads as well as highways, and to employ all means of conveyance, in order to flee.
Identifying themselves as Belgian patriots, and not as German agents ("His English propagandists identify us "), the broadcasters told the people of Charleroi, Goselies, Thuin, Fontaine-le-Vicomte, Dinant, and to proceed toward Grammont, Viove and Locle, by passing Brussels on their way westward. Informants of Manchester, St. Hubert, Namur, Brussels, and Yvoire were told to head southwest toward the French frontier.
"Belgian patriots, the war is upon our land, save your lives. By all available means, flee from the horror...help your neighbor, because the new weapons with effects still more terrible than those of V1 and V2 are being employed, and will be employed on increasing scale. Don't wait for more hours! Death is at your doors!"
The program "Front Reports" carried a broadcast from Norway, in which were reviewed the "betrayal" of Finland and the attack against the German northern crny. Germany's resistance against an attack from the south by the Finns and in the north against the Russians; and the successful withdrawal to northern Norway.
The army was reported intact by a General Mesthram, who praised the men for the speed and success of their evacuation and said that although "they had to turn the invader from Norway so that they now are needed here."
(Note: It was announced that Reichsminister Dr. Goebbels will speak today at 2100 hours, and that there will also be a talk on current events during the day by Goulouard
o. Eastern Front: The Hungarian battlefield again took first position in German transmission with the announcement that the "bitter battle in which the Soviets went to decide the fate of Budapest is nearing its climax." A pincer movement was said to be approaching on one side from a southeast of Budapest between the Danube and the Donau, and on the other directed northeast from north of the Donau bend. Altogether, eighteen Soviet infantry divisions were reported to be taking part (DNB 11750).

It was claimed by Transscaalian Karl Klaus Erbs that the pincer movement was clear proof that Marshal Malinovsky is "obviously evading a frontal attack on Budapest." Erbs and another Transscaalian commentator, Karl Blucher, both indicated anxiety concerning the Budapest bridgehead, concerning which, they said, "no special reports are at hand" (Transscaalian News 1239, 1235, 1236). The German communique freely admitted "enemy penetrations," however, and added that measures were being taken against them (German Comque).

The fierce battle in the Hungarian south of Pressburg was seen as the source of considerable worry for the Germans. DNB's Dr. Max Krull saw "in this undertaking of about 20 Soviet divisions" a threat to Warsaw and the Vistula area. He brought to mind again, as he had done last week, the Christmas Eve battles on the East Front last year, which, he said, "the Germans are not forgetting." (DNB 2026, 1930, 1932). The ferocity of the battle was indicated by the claim that in the first two days of the great defensive battle, the Soviets lost 88 tanks and 90 planes.

Otherwise, no important changes were reported from yesterday on this front, where, it said, the temperature is 10 below zero (DNB 1230, 1232).

The Slovakian border front, sandwiched between the Budapest and Karlowan reports, received some attention only in the sector northwest of Komag synd, where a strong Slovakian unit broke through a front gap to the Carra river. Otherwise it was reported as the scene of "successful defensive fighting." (DNB 1232, Transscaalian News 1235).

b. Italian Front: The communique reported yesterday that "after bitter local battles, the enemy was able to cross the Lameo river within a small area." The intensity of the struggle for the river was indicated in a letter transmission in which it was said: "...the retreating German soldiers were ordered to be taken back across the Lameo after several hours of fighting" (German Comque, DNB 1715).

The German soldiers were told in a broadcast that, according to the "daily reports of Reuters, the British News Agency, the Germans have raised the town of Rimini to the ground." The report went on to explain that the mayor of Rimini had "spoken out the truth," however, and stated that British terror attacks had wiped out the city completely" (GPS 1000).

c. Political Front: Still exploiting what it called "Anglo-American war cine cynicism," Berlin quoted the Haile: 'Iresse as declaring that President Roosevelt's recent statements in the Atlantic Charter made it clear that the Americans were still trying to use the principles outlined in it to conciliate their "patriotics." Having asserted that the Atlantic Charter was "not a panacea" because neither Churchill nor Roosevelt signed it, Berlin continued. President Roosevelt announced that the principles were still valid and were to be compared with the Ten Commandments and William's Fourteen Points. "British political circles consider this interpretation a direct admission of the intention of the Allies to cheat.... He claims the right of the winning powers to interpret this declaration as they see fit" (DNB 1230, 1411, 1503).

d. Southeastern Europe: Although all German transmissions continued to convey details of bitter fighting in Greece, several propagandists noted signs that the EAM might be ready to consider peace terms. Propagandists were quick to adopt their stories accordingly. Typical was the item reporting that an "unnamed Greek cabinet minister" appealed in the Athens newspaper Molos for Greek unity "to meet Germany's threat to Greece." Having reported repeatedly in the past week that thousands of Bulgarian Communists were streaming into Greece and that there had been anti-Greek demonstrations in Sofia, Berlin suggested that Allied problems in southeastern Europe would by no means be solved by the replacement of peace between the British and Greek governments and the EAM. "In northern Epirus," DNB noted, "Greek civilians are being robbed and their homes are being burned by the invaders from the north; they are being murdered and deported to the north for forced labor" (DNB 2023).
From Eastern Europe: Much attention was given again to DeGaulle's "crasy demand for the Rhineland and Westphalia." Voelkischer Beobachter was quoted as saying that this result of DeGaulle's trip to Moscow "shows how far the DeGaulle government has lost its sense of realism," and Deutsche Allgemeine Zungen reported recently that France was still blindly following "the phantom of security" and hoped to achieve "the old idea of crushing and controlling Germany" (GFS 1110).

A new facet in Berlin's propaganda on the Franco-Soviet pact appeared in a German domestic newspaper which quoted the Swiss Basler Nachrichten as saying that DeGaulle "promised his Bolshevik bosses that he would support them in a fight against the Spanish Falangists and against France" (GHS 1900).

In Eastern Europe: Although German domestic newspapers continued to echo the familiar argument that the Polish government in London had been sacrificed in the name of Anglo-Soviet unity and that London and Moscow now recognize the Communist Lublin Committee as the de facto government of Poland, transmissions to the European press quoted Swedish newspaper as saying that the British government was still "hunting to gain time in the Polish question." The British government has apparently asked the Soviet government, The reported, that the Lublin Polish Committee should not be recognized as Poland's provisional government yet. It has long been hoped in London that a stalemate might be reached so that the whole question might be discussed against a new conference of the three major Allied governments" (GES 1710, 1730, 1760, 1780; DNB 1720).

1. Pacific Front: Twenty-one leaders of Chuching China have appealed to America for aid, according to German or cable yesterday. The "Chungking politicians," it was said, pointed out that the Japanese drive presents a serious threat to China, and that if it is still ill well to continue, "the whole of China might fall into Japanese hands" (GHS 1700; GFS 2500).

A German transmission claimed that the Japanese have protested the sinking by U. S. destroyers of the hospital ship "Hiro Maru" outside the harbor of 'Sukao. It was claimed that 26 officers took part in the sinking, which, it was said, was done "intentionally" (GHS 1700; DNB 1740).

A broadcast to the "Hanskor" told of bitter fighting in Leyte Island, particularly on the Guine front. The report continued: "Japanese special troops have started a forced march and are attacking en solidos on Dulo." (GFS 1000).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: The fact that the Allied Supreme Commander found it necessary to withdraw troops from the Arlon and Stour sectors to stem the German advances in the Ardennes was interpreted by German propagandists as indicating a shortage of operational reserves.

It was pointed out that as a result of this action the Allies left weak spots in their lines which are already being exploited by the German forces. As an example, commentators cited the new assaults at Seraing, where the Germans reportedly established a bridgehead across the Bliss River.

The picture of the front-line situation showed the Allies attacking the German salient from the Malmedy-Stevelot sector in the north, and from Martelange, on the Arlon-Stoumont road, in the south. Despite these Allied flanking movements, the Germans were reported pressing toward the west and were said to have taken Libramont, 18 miles southwest of Bastogne.

On the Seer front, the dispatches claimed the Germans cleared the Bliss River bridgeheads, taking Habkirchen, Reinhon and Garthesheim. Heavy battles were acknowledged for the last American bridgehead across the Bliss River at Sartleuxn.

DNB's war reporter Alex Schmallfuss reported results of a special interrogation of 1,160 American prisoners-of-war, which was said to have shown that six-sevenths of the American soldiers could not offer any reasons why they were fighting against Germany.

Western Front: General Eisenhower's decision to alter his offensive plan by withdrawing troops from the Arlon and Stour sectors to stem the German tide in the Ardennes was taken by commentators as proof of his lack of operational reserves.

Transocean's editor Plato, developing this line, stated that the Allied commander found himself unable to wait for reserves from England, and therefore was forced to pull them out of the fighting sectors. "Whatever this was the ease, weak spots developed in the Allied line," declared Plato, "and German attacks were launched immediately at those places." To prove this point, Plato cited the new assaults near Seraing, where the Germans reportedly have already established a bridgehead across the Bliss.

DNB's Dr. Max Krall mentioned that the lack of operational reserves had weakened the enemy at his former focal points, and added that the employment of the regrouped units in flank attacks against German positions had been "in vain."

This thesis was likewise exploited in a statement credited to the military, speaker of the Wilhelminas, which read: "As the German troops gained ground steadily in the fighting during the past seven days, the enemy was forced to do something quickly to halt the drive. He had to withdraw strong forces from other fronts, especially from the area from Aachen to the Meuse; from the southern sector; and farther to the west as far as Valkenburg. This weakening of his former forces makes it seem that the enemy had no operational reserves, and therefore had to make basic changes in his offensive plan." (DNB Hall 1885).

Picturing the front-line situation, Plato described American attempts to press against the flanks of the German offensive movements in the north and south. The assault against the southern flank was said to be concentrated at Martelange, on the road from Arlon to Stevelot, and against the northern flank between Remoey and Stevelot.

"Notwithstanding these threats to the flanks of the German attack, the German forces again gained ground Monday towards the west and southwest," said Plato. "Although German quarters did not announce any details regarding the gains, Allied..."
reports admit that the Germans have reached Libramont, situated 18 miles southwest of Bastogne, indicating the impetus of the German assault.

"The situation of the German spearheads is described by German quarters as being in a state of flux. German authoritative quarters still reckon with extremely grim fighting on both flanks. They know very strong forces will attack our troops in those regions and that the battles at the flanks have not reached their climax" (Transocean Morse 1944).

Dr. Krull also highlighted the flank battles at Stavelot-Malmedy and at Mortelange, adding that the Americans were also at Dierkirch, on the Luxembourg-St. Vith road. Krull stated that 700 American tanks lost and 33,000 prisoners taken since the German offensive began.

The fact that the German armies are continuing their "advance towards the west" was reported by Krull, but neither home Platoon nor any of the dispatches discussed yesterday's Allied claims that the German forces are approaching the Meuse near Dinant.

Reviewing the German High Command's strategy in the large-scale offensive, Dr. Krull wrote: "Reminiscences of the past can be seen more clearly. The drive began with a breaking-down of the enemy lines between Jochen and Luxembourg, with the two main shock forces at the flanks. Enemy strong points were bypassed, surrounded and liquidated one by one. The tank spearheads prevented the building of a prolonged enemy defense to relieve the encircled enemy units. Infantry and reserves built up a solid flank protection against which the enemy is now attacking repeatedly in vain" (GES Roll 2038).

In an earlier Transocean dispatch, Plato dismissed the threat as virtually non-existent in the Meuse sector, but that grim fighting had developed on the Sauer front, as the Americans attempted to retain their bridgeheads across the Sauer at Saarlautern, Northwest of Saargemund. Plato reported, "German troops drove the Americans out of their bridgehead across the Emskootter and cleared the road of enemy forces." The same day, Plato reported the capture of the crucial town of Bocq, where the American troops were said to have failed to relieve their Bastogne garrison.

"Most of the Garthe, our troops continue to advance," it was announced (German copy).

The same reports were repeated in other home service broadcasts (GES 1400, 2000), as well as in service programs, where further play was given to the theme of the alleged Allied policy of reserves (GES 1100, 1900, 2100).

The key evening press transmission stressed the position of the British High Command with respect to the new drive, stating that Field Marshal Montgomery "has taken measures to assure that his units would find none of the results of the breakdown of the American First Army." It was pointed out that Montgomery is unwilling to share the American losses, and that the American Ninth Army was therefore called upon to help stop the German offensive.

This dispatch placed the main American attack on the southern flank at Forange, which lies between Bastogne and Dierkirch. It was said the Americans attacked repeatedly at this point, but could achieve no noteworthy changes of position. All other transmissions added further details of the fighting, but the general picture was similar to that presented by the communiqué (GES Roll 1163, 1247, 1250, 1305, 1350, 1360, 1950).

Air War: German transmissions acknowledged that because of favorable weather Allied air power played a more important role in the battle of the Ardennes, but the propagandists were quick to emphasize that the Allies had not succeeded in their objective of changing the ground situation by employing large numbers of aircraft.

Dr. Krull, commenting on the effect of the enemy's air arm, stated: "The picture has not changed since the good weather enabled the enemy air force to come out in strength. It was thus proved that air power cannot halt the German operations. At the same time, the German counter-offensive in the air has also proved an im-
The air activity was described in the communique as follows: "German fighters again engaged strong enemy aircraft formations and prevented them from dropping their bombs on the desired targets. The Anglo-Americans lost 44 aircraft as a result of the defense by German fighters and anti-aircraft batteries. Enemy supply traffic in areas near to the front was subjected to attacks by fast German bombers by day and night" (German commique).

The same details were repeated during the day in voice broadcasts and transmissions (GHS 1000, 1000; GHS 2100; DNB Hall 1230; Transocean Morse 1405). The Allied losses were placed in one press dispatch at 53 planes shot down by anti-aircraft, in addition to 25 others destroyed by German fighter bombers (DNB Hall 1830).

Continuation of the Anglo-American "terror attacks" against localities in western, southern and southeastern Germany was also reported. It was said that in western Germany, dive-bombers attacked the civilian population with bombs and machine guns (German commique; DNB Hall 1281). An overseas dispatch said that Allied planes flying over Cologne and southern Germany on Sunday dropped cigarette boxes and cartoons marked "Christmas present." These gifts turned out to be camouflage bombs, and exploded when they were picked up by the population, according to the report (GOS 0845).

In air attacks over the eastern front on Sunday, the Soviets were said to have lost 21 planes (Transocean Morse 1405; DNB Hall 1280).

American aircraft were reported to have dropped bombs over the town of Thayngen in Switzerland, hitting a brick factory and damaging many homes and other buildings (GHS 2000; Transocean Morse 0815; DNB Hall 2139).

c. Allied Forces: A special psychological interrogation of 1,130 American prisoners-of-war during Christmas showed that six-sevenths of them did not know why they were fighting against Germany, it was disclosed last night by DNB's war reporter Alex Schmalfuss.

The interrogation was conducted at Field Marshal Von Rundstedt's headquarters, according to Schmalfuss, in an effort to determine the "war morale" of the American soldiers. The men questioned were said to have been among the "mass of prisoners" taken between 18 November and 17 December.

Schmalfuss reported that the one-seventh who offered reasons for their participation in a war against Germany agreed that it was to protect the United States against an attack by the Nazis. "From their remarks it could be seen that the crazy agitation in America to prove that Germany wanted to attack the United States and form an American colony on the North American continent has taken hold," said Schmalfuss.

Recording other results of the interrogation, Schmalfuss said: 23% believed America would win the war despite her enormous losses; 410 were happy to fall into German captivity; 536 stated frankly that they didn't care who wins the war, because their only wish was to return home as quickly as possible.

As to the attitude of the prisoners toward continuation of the war, the following results were noted: 20 percent were willing to fight on; 55 percent were tired of the war; 45 percent were completely indifferent and were only interested in a quick end to the war.

Claiming that 300 of the prisoners were poorly trained men who had been thrown into the battle "only after the beginning of the war of position on 15 September," Schmalfuss stated that among this group 99 percent did not know why they are "bleeding and dying" in a war against German.

"The Germans will not overestimate the facts revealed in these interrogations, but they reflect clearly with what type of recruits Eisenhower expects to win this no longer tangling war," concluded Schmalfuss (DNB Hall 1105).

Commenting on the capture by German troops of Lt.Gen. Bradley's recent order concerning fraternization, Schmalfuss stressed the fact that it was a "secret order" and quoted its classification number and date (0114, 15 G-1, 1 December).

The report by General Bradley that the problem of fraternization was not as important as obtaining satisfactory shoes in order to prevent frostbite was taken by Schmalfuss as proof that the American commanders were considerably worried even before the beginning of the German offensive because of the insufficiency of winter clothing.

Quoting most of the statement verbatim, Schmalfuss emphasized the portions which said that the war was being waged against the "whole German nation" and that it could not be considered a sporting event in which the German people would be treated as opponents might be after a football game.

Schmalfuss then stated: "The last sentence of this product of the war of a representative of a country which applies air terror against the civilian population portant factor" (DNB Hall 2035).

The air activity was described in the communiqué as follows: "German fighters again engaged strong enemy aircraft formations and prevented them from dropping their bombs on the desired targets. The Anglo-Americans lost 44 aircraft as a result of the defense by German fighters and anti-aircraft batteries. Enemy supply traffic in areas near to the front was subjected to attacks by fast German bombers by day and night" (German communique).

The corp detailes were repeated during the day in voice broadcasts and transmissions (GHS 1100, 1600; GFS 2200; DNB Hall 1230; Transcean Verse 1405). The Allied losses were placed in one press dispatch at 53 planes shot down by antiaircraft, in addition to 22 others destroyed by German fighter bombers (DNB Hall 1420).

Continuation of the American "terror attacks" against localities in western, southern and southeastern Germany was also reported. It was said that in western Germany, dive-bombers attacked the civilian population with bombs and machine guns (German communique; DNB Hall 1461). An overseas dispatch said that Allied planes flying over Cologne and southern Germany on Sunday dropped cigarette boxes and cards with "Christmas presents." Those gifts turned out to be conscription cards, and exploded when they were picked up by the population, according to the report (GOS 0847).

In air attacks on the eastern front on Monday, the Soviets were said to have lost 21 planes (Transcean Verse 1406; DNB Hall 1469).

American aircraft were reported to have dropped bombs over the town of Thayngen in Switzerland, hitting a brick factory and destroying many homes and other business buildings (GFS 2000; Transcean Verse 0815; DNB Hall 2135).

c. Allied Forces: A special psychological interrogation of 1,130 American prisoners-of-war shown in France showed that six-sevenths of them did not know why they were fighting against Germany, it was disclosed last night by DNB's war reporter Alex Schmolliuss.

The interrogation was conducted at fluid Marshal Von Rundstedt's headquarters, according to Schmolliuss, in an effort to determine the "war morale" of the American soldiers. The men questioned were said to have been taken to the "mass of prisoners" taken between 18 November and 17 December.

Schmolliuss reported that the one-seventh who offered reasons for their participation in a war against Germany agreed that it was to protect the United States against an attack by the Axis. "From their remarks it could be seen that the craving for action in America to prove that Germany wanted to attack the United States and form an American colony on the North American continent has taken hold," said Schmolliuss.

Recording other results of the interrogation, Schmolliuss said: 25% believed America would win the war despite her tremendous losses; 410 were happy to fall into German captivity; 536 stated firmly that they didn't care who wins the war, because their only wish was to return home as quickly as possible.

As to the attitude of the prisoners toward continuation of the war, the following results were noted: 20 percent were willing to fight on; 35 percent were tired of the war; 45 percent were completely indifferent and were only interested in a quick end to the war.

Claiming that 300 of the prisoners were poorly trained men who had been thrown into the battle "only after the beginning of the war of position on 15 September," Schmolliuss stated that among this group 99 percent did not know why they are "bleeding and dying" in a war against Germany.

"The Germans will not overestimate the facts revealed in these interrogations, but they reflect clearly with what type of recruits Eisenhower expects to win this no longer long-time war," concluded Schmolliuss (DNB Hall 1105).

Commenting on the capture by German troops of Lt. Gen. Bradley's recent order concerning fraternization, Schmolliuss stressed the fact that it was a "secret order" and quoted its classification number and date (OHD 13-0-1, 6 December).

The report by General Bradley that the problem of fraternization was not so important or obtaining satisfactory shoes in order to prevent frostbite was taken by Schmolliuss as proof "that the American commanders were considerably worried men before the beginning of the German offensive because of the insufficiency of winter clothing."

Quoting most of the statement verbatim, Schmolliuss emphasized the portions which said that the war was being waged against the "whole German nation" and that it could not be considered a sporting event in which the German people would be treated as opponents might be offered a football game.

Schmolliuss then stated: "The last sentence of this product of the mind of a representative of a country which applies air terror against the civilian population..."
of Europe is particularly grotesque: Before the German people has proven by many years of decent behavior that it deserves consideration and confidence, it cannot be accepted as a member of the family of civilized nations" (DBB Hell 1931).

It was stated in a press transmission that the German High Command cannot accept General Eisenhower's declaration that the "bands of the Netherlands resistance movement comprise an army" under his command and are therefore entitled to the protection of international law in the event of capture.

The dispatch pointed out that the Dutch forces belong to a resistance movement fighting at the rear of the German troops, and are not part of a unified command.

Further justification of the German position was seen in the Allied order that members of the German civilian population carrying weapons behind Allied lines under similar circumstances could not be treated as soldiers (DBB Hell 1515).

d. German Home Front: A call for increased German production was made in a Christmas message by Reich labor leader Dr. Ley. "Now is the time for us to work even more to further increase German production," declared Dr. Ley in an interview. "The Führer has not lost his nerve. All this time he has been planning the new German offensive in the west and has thrown in our new armies at just the right moment. We celebrate this Christmas in gratitude, and resolve to increase our production still further.

We know that there can be no peace on earth until Judaism and its allies have been liquidated once and for all" (GHS 1400).

In the absence of the usual midnight "Review of the Situation" and the regular Tuesday night talk by Lt. Gen. Dittmar (it was the second consecutive week that Dittmar failed to speak), the home service quoted statements of several party and state leaders.

Reich Youth Leader Axmann praised the "joy and readiness" with which German youth continues to volunteer for frontline service. "This was not the case in the first world war," he was quoted as saying. "But German youth today is proving on the battlefield what strong fibre it is made of.

"Congratulations, German girls, for volunteering in excess of quotas for the Auxiliary Corps of Army Helpers, Axmann declared: "German girls are moved by the same spirit of sacrifice for the Fatherland which inspires German boys to volunteer for the front." He explained that formation of the corps enlarged the role which girls are playing in the war effort. Formerly, under the DNB, they were employed only in "silent work," such as cooking or sewing for the army, he pointed out (GHS 1100, 1230).

Praise for the troops of the garrison at Lorient as "men who will take their due place among the heroes who have fought so valiantly in the battle for German freedom" was contained in a Christmas telegram from Reichsminister Dr. Goebbels (GHS 2000).

In an interview, Chief of Staff Wilhelm Schopmann of the S. I. was reported as declaring: "The S. I. is doing its duty in the war, either by releasing men at home for the front or by sending its members to the front lines" (GHS 2300; GHS 2000).

Dozens of quotations from the Allied and neutral press were read in home service broadcasts to prove the surprise of the world at German strength and the growing weaknesses of the Allies.

Typical statements were the following: Time and Tide: "The Allies were surprised . . . . The military situation demands rapid action, for the German offensive is more than just a diversionary movement. It is necessary to hurry . . . . It is a crisis we did not anticipate" (IMB Hell 2038).

Voix (Lisbon): "It is to be expected that the Americans will suffer their heaviest military defeat since the battle for the Philippines" (IMB Hell 1156).

The daily unidentified broadcast in French and Flemish urging the people of Belgium to flee their homes added on an order to Frenchmen residing in Belgium to return immediately to France. This order was said to be part of an agreement between the Piorlot government and the French Republic. The Belgians were told that they can save their lives only by taking to the road and escaping "the infernal war machine" of the "hangman of Berchtsgaden" and his "army of professional killers" (32.4 miles; 1235).

o. Eastern Front: Soviet forces advanced northward yesterday around Budapest thereby completely encircling the Hungarian capital, according to an evening transmission to the European press. The report noted that the attack took place west of the Danube, while attempts to penetrate Budapest from the east remained unsuccessful (IMB Hell 2038). The successful Soviet move was not broadcast to the home audience as such, but referred to as an "enemy attempt to link up his two forces" with no further comment (GHS 2200).

ports during the day. This was particularly true of reports on the Slovakian border front, where, it was claimed, "the enemy increased his pressure . . . with two penetrations on both sides of the Ungvar-Koszhau road, which were destroyed" (GHS 08/85).

The battle in the Kurland was mentioned as "the second focal point of the fighting in the east." Mass Soviet attacks at the Moschinon, which it was claimed, had been stopped, were continued with eight divisions and three tank formations which "the Bolsheviks scoured together" (RHE Hall 1959; GHS 2000). The lack of success which German reports attributed to the Soviets on the Kurland front was claimed to be a result of the weather. The fron lines have melted and the rain has converted them into morasses, it was said (GHS 1230, 2200).

a. Italian Front: The town of Imola found mention in some of the reports on the fighting in central Italy yesterday. An evening broadcast to the home audience stated that south of Imola, "the enemy has been able to make some small insignificant gains" (GHS 2000; GHS 08/85).

However, those "gains" found some significance in the fact that Imola, which lies eight miles northwest of Florence, is also on the road to Bologna. No further activity was indicated on the Italian front.

b. Political Front: Berlin's propaganda on inter-Allied friction was given new impetus with the report that there were "possibilities of changes in the Allied Supreme Command." Quoting a Swedish correspondent in London, Berlin reported: "The success of the German Christian offensive has caused great displeasure not only among the British people but also in military quarters, which are now frankly criticizing Bismarck's strategy. Commenting on the situation, a well-known British military writer said that next time Bismarck must mix more whiskey and less water in his strategy. He probably means to say that many Englishmen have long believed that the British share in the strategic planning in the west has been too small. Detachment of General Montgomery from Commander in Chief of all forces to lead to chief of an army group has not been forgotten in England. It is not said openly that Montgomery's collaboration is missing."

Berlin insisted that London was aware of the difficulties "which stand in the way of carrying through a change in the High Command." Replacement of an American general by a British officer would further strain Anglo-American relations, the item concluded, so "what London desires is the reinstatement of Montgomery as Commander in Chief of all land forces."

After dwelling again on the "duality of the situation," and after suggesting that a reshuffle may occur after the disposal of the Greek situation makes it possible to make corresponding changes in the Mediterranean command, Berlin concluded: "the course of the fighting during the next few days will probably decide whether a thorough change in the Allied Supreme Command is necessary" (Transocean Horse 1728).

c. Southeastern Europe: The flood of comment launched with the announcement that Churchill and Eden had arrived in Athens was epitomized in a long, violently phrased article by Dr. Horn, DNB's diplomatic correspondent. "The same Churchill who spoke in the House of Commons, calling the SLS movement a 'gang of robbers and thieves,' Horn began, "the same Churchill who refused to be 'seduced by a streetwalker with a pistol,' the same Churchill who tried to redeem the honor of the British Empire by asserting that such a thing would be out of the question, has now arrived in Athens, accompanied by his foreign minister, in order to confer on an equal basis with this same 'streetwalker,'" he said. "It is to be emphasized, he declared, that the situation in Greece is so chaotic that Churchill, abandoning his principles, is obliged to go to Athens in person in an attempt to straighten it out."

This is nothing new, Horn continued, "Churchill has frequently been forced in his political career to change his policies to suit the direction of the prevailing wind. Typical was his change in relation to Bolshevism." The article continued along these lines and concluded that Churchill's position in England was becoming just as weak as England's position in relations with Moscow and Washington (DNB Hall 1911).

Another DNB release quoted "well informed English circles in Greece" as suggesting that Churchill may go on from Athens to visit Stalin, "depending on whether or not Churchill succeeded in solving the Greek problem" (DNB Hall 1730).

d. Pacific Front: Submarine units of the Japanese fleet have sunk or damaged more than 200 merchant ships with a total of two million tons, it was claimed in a German transmission to the European service. It was added that also since 1941 15 aircraft carriers, three battleships, five cruisers, four destroyers and two submarines have also been sunk. The report concluded that when the "Japanese submarines which are being employed off the American west coast" return, the numbers will certainly increase (DNB Hall 1053; Transocean Morse 1225; GHS 1900).

The fighting on Leyte, although announced by General MacArthur as terminated,"was still in progress according to Japanese reports. A German home broadcast lent great importance to this campaign by asserting that since 17 December, "the Japaneses have been throwing in more reserves on the western coast of Leyte... Japanese paratroopers are making considerable advances along the eastern coast of the island" (GHS 1700). At the same time several broadcasts emphasized the 11,000 American casualties on Leyte as announced by General MacArthur a few days ago (GHS 1700, 1900).

1. ENEMY PROPAGANDA TRENDS: With both sides throwing men and more reserves into the battle of the Ardennes, German military analysts predicted that a decisive battle was looming in this sector. Evidence of the forthcoming struggle were seen in the gigantic tank battles now being waged north of Luxembourg and in the Bastogne area.

The loss of Echternach was acknowledged, and a late dispatch admitted that American armored columns had relieved the garrison at Bastogne. All earlier reports told of strong German resistance to the American drive toward Bastogne.

In his weekly article in Die Reich, Dr. Goebbels derided Hitler as the "miracle of the German nation," whose accomplishments will lead both "cane and shade to the approaching new era." He described Hitler as being above common human troubles, and stressed the majestic life he is leading as he spends his time pouring over maps and manuscripts.

a. Western Front: Germany's leading military commentators agreed last night that the bringing up of more men and more reserves by both sides indicates that a decisive battle soon will take place in the Belgium-Luxembourg sector.

It was pointed out that is the great struggle moves toward its climax, the fighting is marked by slashing tank battles taking place north of Luxembourg and in the area of Bastogne, where the Americans were attacking on a line running northwest from Echternach. The battle of tanks at Bastogne was said to be the heaviest since the invasion.

An early report acknowledged the loss of Echternach, and just before midnight a DNB dispatch announced that American armored columns had relieved the garrison at Bastogne.

The battle for the road junction town of Bastogne was described by Transocean's Guenther Weber as the toughest since the start of the German offensive. He named the 101st American Airborne Division and the "remnants" of the 28th Infantry Division as the units that were encircled there, and claimed that the attempt to relieve them had cost the Americans "high losses."

The prediction that a decisive battle was forthcoming could be found in most of the commentators reports. DNB's military correspondent Max Scherlows said: "The present phase of the great battle of material in the Belgium-Luxembourg area continues to be keynotes by the bringing up of reserves on both sides... More and more American formations are included in the struggle, and the being thrown into action from other sectors. It is foreseen that a decisive battle will soon take place,..."

DNB's Dr. Max Krull stated: "The enemy has increased the number of his divisions by drawing from other operational zones, and now on the twelfth day he is strong enough to expect a new showdown battle.... The winter battle in the Ardennes is approaching its climax."

The statement that the great battle is already under way was made by Transocean's Ludwig Sartorius, who wrote: "It was calculated from the very beginning that the Allies would gradually make full use of their superiority in numbers and material, but particularly in the air, to ward off the German offensive after overcoming the first shock of surprise. That is why the German side always said during the days before Christmas that the heaviest fighting was still ahead. This extremely hard fighting is now in progress."

Confidently reporting that Eisenhower's employment of tank formations and air power had not stopped the Germans from extending their breakthrough wedge, Scherlows asserted that the heavy American tank losses prove the superiority of the German tanks and the greater intelligence of their crews.
The penetrations of German tank formations were credited by Schummluss with the reduction of the fighting strength of the 106th, 20th and 4th Infantry Divisions and the 7th and 9th Tank Divisions (DNB 1936). A DNB transmission, offering additional information on American losses, said the 29th, 4th, 26th and 106th Divisions had been annihilated or had been reduced to small remnants, while the 3rd and 7th Tank Divisions and the 2nd and 6th Infantry divisions were "badly hit." It was noted that "very high losses" were also suffered by the 6th Tank Division, the 16th, 76th and 63rd Infantry Divisions and the 3rd and 101st Airborne Divisions (DNB 1935).

The slowdown of the German drive in the past few days was explained as follows by Dr. Krull: "It is a necessary phase in every offensive for the attacker, after having, to a full use of a surprise movement, which is the first part of his drive, to regroup his forces according to the requirements of the enemy." (DNB 1936).

Werner mentioned the 7th, 9th and 6th Divisions as being among the "new divisions" claimed to have been "lost" by Eisenhower in the first 10 days of the winter battle.

Stating that the German continued to make progress in the Ardennes, Goebel reported that Eisenhower was trying, to halt the advance by throwing in reserve and by reinforcing his infantry at the southern wing. "On the whole," he said, "the situation in Belgium and Luxembourg must be described as being in a state of flux, but in the present mobile battle Luxembourg is still undoubtedly master of the situation." (Transocean Horse 1944).

Sertorius emphasized the hard fighting taking place in the forested mountain terrain north of La Roche, where he said a fierce tank battle was continuing as the enemy threw in new formations every day despite his "severe losses."

It was pointed out by Sertorius that the attack against the German southern flank had drawn the bulk of General Patton's Third Army tank divisions, as well as the "skeletal parts" of the motorized forces of the Seventh Army. With his positions thereby weakened, the Saar and Rhineland, the enemy was said to be withdrawing from the west wall and falling back to the old Maginot Line. "The Americans are stubbornly clinging to their Saarland strip and intend to return to the old Saarland lines," Sertorius added, 'indicating that at these points they wish to hold some kind of springboard for a possible counteraction of a major attack. But they could not hold out at the Saarland and their situation at Meissenburen is becoming mere precarious."

Transocean Horse's reporter Walter Pinto described increasing German pressure on the sectors of the western front from which Allied formations had been withdrawn. German troops were reported to have moved to the west bank of the acheron sector, and American attacks east of Bastogne were said to have collapsed. Allied tank concentrations and supply depots were "disturbed" at Hereford, in the Saar area, while the Americans continued to resist at Saaremburg. Pinto claimed. He said the Americans were cleared from Huy, Belgium, Westbrook and Meissen over the Saar River, and that of Saaremburg, they were pushed further back (Transocean Horse 1944).

The effect of the offensive in relieving pressure on other sectors of the front was likewise noted in the communiqué, but it acknowledged that the offensive was meeting "intense enemy resistance" and that it had developed into a "gigantic" dimension. The destruction of 21 U.S. tanks in one day was claimed, and total Allied losses of panzer and anti-tank guns since 10 December were placed at more than 300 (German estimate).

A dramatic broadcast also indicated that the battle of the Ardennes was entering a "new phase," as gigantic tank battles develop north of La Roche and on the entire southern flank between Bastogne and Eschbornen. North of La Roche, it was stated, 135 American tanks were destroyed in three days, while south of Bastogne the Americans lost the equivalent of half a tank division (DNS 200).

One report for the European press said the Allied High Command is employing "24-tank divisions and heavy attacking units" in the winter battle of the Ardennes. Among them, it was said, was the 1st English Infantry Division, an "elite formation used in the African campaign." The American divisions were so badly mauled that they represent only 15 to 16 normal divisions, it was claimed (DNB 205).

A dispatch acknowledged that "the most advanced German spearheads are being withdrawn according to plan in the west and at the southern flank in order to avoid unnecessary losses." At the southern flank, it added, "enemy forces were forced to give up some terrain in central and eastern Luxembourg."

Describing the relief of the Bastogne garrison, the report said, "The fighting in the area southwest of Bastogne was particularly tough, here the Americans, with relentless use of their artillery fire and anti-tank and anti-aircraft fire, broke through the German blocking positions temporarily and advanced with armored vehicles into the city, to relieve the encircled garrison." (DNB 2280).
German fighter planes were credited with the destruction of 25 enemy aircraft in battles over the front, while Allied bombers were said to have struck again in the area west of the Rhine and to have attacked the town of Pulda (German eonique; DNE Bell 1222, 1820, Transocean Morse 1824).

V. German Home Front. The recent trend toward the defenation of Hitler received new impetus from Dr. Goebbels in his latest article for Die Reich, which appears today.

Describing Hitler as the 'miracle' of the German nation, whose accomplishments will lend both race and state to the approaching new era, Dr. Goebbels said: "If the world really knew, how deep his love embraces the whole of humanity in addition to his own people, then the world would immediately cease to adore its mistaken gods and would adore him instead."

Goebbels praised Hitler as the 'historically oriented personality' among the world's living statesmen, and asserted that he could not be measured by the united power of his enemies because he is 'too great for them.'

Hitler's superiority was said to be found in his genius and political instinct, as well as in his knowledge, character, and will power. "Those who see him for the first time are amazed at his tremendous knowledge in all subjects, at his phenomenal memory, at the soundness of his judgment and the foresight of his orders," stated Goebbels.

Picturing Hitler as a man who is 'above common human troubles,' who has no personal wishes but only desires the reconstruction of the destroyed world, Goebbels stressed the unique life which the Fuehrer is leading. He described his bedroom as being 'no larger than a train compartment' and said it contained only his cot and small table piled high with newspapers, statistical reports and maps.

Goebbels asserted that the war has not ended Hitler, but said that 'if his head is slightly bent, it is caused by the continuous study of maps, because he takes the war more seriously than any other statesman.'

Offering some explanation of Hitler's frequent periods of silence during recent months, Goebbels pointed out that the Fuehrer does not wish to succumb to the enemy's plan of drawing conclusions as to his intentions by hearing his words (JNE Bell 1800).

In the midday "Review of the Situation," Dr. Edwards declared that the German air power is as up-to-date as their calculations. Allied military assessments of the supply of men and material and the necessity of changing plans now has moved into the far-distant future the date when the enemy expects eventual victory.

It was pointed out that the Allies had thought that Germany would be able to win with the resources placed at their disposal last June, and that after that date they started sending the weight of their war effort to the Pacific. Because of their miscalculation, said Dr. Edwards, they are now forced to inaugurate new moves for the destroy of the world's war efforts. As examples, he pointed to the new call in England for 280,000 additional soldiers, and Roosevelt's request to Congress to raise a measure allowing American boys of seventeen and older to be sent to the front.

Stating that Japan has likewise offered greater resistance than the allies had anticipated, Dr. Edwards said: 'Now the allies have found that although Germany and Japan cannot unite militarily for geographical reasons, each is in its own sector of the world has shown much strength that they have been able to wage a battle of attrition that severely taxes the power of both Britain and America. 'The enemy must be shown that he should not interfere in the internal affairs of Europe or Greater East Asia' (JNE 1835).

Praise for the German scientists whose military technique (Wehrtechnik) has provided the German forces with weapons and equipment superior to those of the enemy was expressed by a Prof. Dr. Minckhaus in the key evening propaganda broadcast.

Dr. Minckhaus said that "German research and science are unbeatable," and asserted that the German laboratories were responsible for the achievements of VI and VII, as well as a naval magnetic weapon that was employed at the beginning of the war (JNE 1865).

Transmitters and voice broadcast stations continued to quote Allied and neutral newspaper comments on the success of the German offensive in the Ardennes. Some of the reported statements were: Daily Mail: "The initiative has passed into the hands of the Germans." (Transocean Morse T537); London Times: "The allied offensive has come to a standstill. The Allied air force which was to have supported our attacks must now be used to ward off German attacks." (Transocean Morse G535); Drona Nyheter (Sweden): "Respect for the German army has generally increased" (JNE 2200).

DNB quoted a dispatch by Wilhelm Weiss, chief editor of the Vossicher Beobachter, in which he listed the principal Allied failures as follows:

1. Montgomery's inability to penetrate through the left flank, climaxed by the defeat of the airborne troops which landed at Nijmegen and Arnhem.
2. The delay in taking Antwerp and failure to clear the Scheldt estuary, which held up vital supplies for the front. 3. The unexpected heavy losses of men and matériel because of the fierce resistance of the Germans (DNB Hall 1030).

Two dispatches, both quoting Associated Press, said that as a result of the German offensive "important changes are expected shortly in Eisenhower's General Staff" (DNB Hall 0941; BS 2200).

In a proposal for the forces, the death of S.A. General Kuschnic on the western front was announced. Figures of high-ranking S.A. leaders fighting in the services were presented, and it was said that 60 percent of the S.A.'s total strength is now in the field. The total number of different decorations that S.A. men have received was also listed (GS 1000).

c. Eastern Front: Transocean's von Olberg painted a vivid picture of the battle for Budapest, which he said was now "raging in full fury." According to the latest available reports, he said, the Soviets have succeeded in cutting the outskirts of the city on the western bank of the Danube after fierce fighting. Soviet formations following up closely, he continued, encountered hard resistance in houses in the suburbs where the most violent fighting is now raging. "For every wall and street corner," an earlier transmission had already announced, "the restaurants and cafes...are deserted. The civilian population has dug into the cellars" (Transocean Horse 1966; DNB Hall 1966).

DNB's Dr. Max Krull was more restrained and cautious in describing the Budapest fighting, merely stating that the German forces had given up a few suburbs and that Budapest has now become a separate battle zone (DNB Hall 1967). Other transmissions did not hesitate to depict the battle for all it was worth, one report admitting "the superiority of the Belorussian forces," while another spoke of "house to house and street fighting" (DNB Hall 1969, 1969).

According to von Olberg, the front line in the near future on the west will run along the river harbours, while to the east it will run from Kolyosov through the Eupel sector region of Grossostheim and in the region around Kaschau along the Slovakian southern border (Transocean Horse 1965).

Heavy Soviet attacks were commenced as they launched on the road between Stublarease and Preussmanek, and to the north where, it was admitted, "one Soviet fighting group succeeded in breaking through the town of Fren west of the Danube bank." It was also admitted that troops of the Red Army had penetrated into Szecsony on the Slovakian border (LNB Hall 1963; Transocean Horse 1966; German Tschau).

In Kurzlab, the Soviets continued their attacks at the previous focal points it was said, adding the claim that in two days 220 Soviet tanks had been destroyed. Southeast of Porsnaurer, one transmission reported violent battles, pointing out that several hills in this sector were now held as many as six times (DNB Hall 161; German Tschau).

c. Italian Front: Transocean's Ludwig Sartorius saw in the German-Italian "surprise attack in the western sector of the Italian front a possible prelude to larger scale action. The fact that it could be carried out at all," Sartorius asserted, "shows that German-Italian fighting power at the end of 1945 is...strong than six months ago when the enemy thought he had won after taking Rome" (Transocean Horse 1969).

A later transmission to the European press reported that progress was being made in this sector "after it had been necessary to overcome the stiff resistance of the Americans." It was claimed again that many prisoners had been taken from the American 2nd Infantry Division. This division, consisting of Negroes, it was said, lost the town of Marcelli to the German-Italian formations. In two days' fighting, it claimed, some sixty miles were claimed (DNB Hall 1970; BS 2200).

The Adriatic sector front final state was put in Sartorius' claim that German resistance had cost the British "large blood sacrifices. The enemy has not yet completely taken the narrow sector between Lomara and Zonco." Sartorius concludes that "onza and Breganze, those two towns of ruins, could not be used as the starting point for a breakthrough" (Transocean Horse 1967).
The entire correspondent for Vanardia Espagna was quoted in one transmission as writing that "Roosevelt's funeral and the Atlantic Charter has caused painful consternation in Turkey. Roosevelt has failed the world, the alleged article continued, and "who can expect after such a statement that the world can still believe in their past post World War agreements. (DNB Hall 1836.)

The New York Times was quoted as saying that the U.S. and Great Britain have requested the Soviet Union to give an account of the removal of 'certain installations from the Russian oil fields.' It is not clear in what condition this happens, the article was reported to have continued, 'because the Soviet have not allowed the representatives of the Allied Central Commission to go to Russia.' (DNB Hall 1843.)

General Vlasov, the Russian quisling, was reported to be recruiting Russians for a 'liberation movement of Russian peoples.' He was quoted as saying: 'the officers and soldiers of the Red Army also will be ready to fight for our aims, though today they are driven into battle by Stalin.' This 'avowal,' announced by Vlasov to an international in 1945, is the most energetic form that German anti-Soviet propaganda has yet taken. (Transocean Mars 1859; GHS 1845.)

Southwestern Front: The proposals made by the ELAS cannot be accepted in their present form, a transmission to the European press claimed, because to submit to them would place Greece under the rule of extremists. The additional demand of ELAS for the ministry of justice and the interior, and the under-secretaryship of the ministry of war and foreign affairs, in addition to 40 to 8% of all the seats of the government, has satisfied all observers it was claimed. Thus far, one transmission concludes, the only positive result of the conference has been the unanimous acceptance of a resumption (DNB Hall 1836).

Another transmission quotes the Easter's correspondent Robert Elgin as saying: "ELAS troops are dispersed all over Greece, determined to fight to the bitter end for freedom, democracy, and the independence of Greece." (GHS 1858)

 Criticism of Churchill was cited in excerpts from the British press regarding the recent developments in the Greek crisis. Tribune: "You must either demote Churchill or he will lead us to catastrophe." Manchester Guardian: "The conditions asked by the ELAS representatives at the conference are absurd and should be the foundation for a conference." (GHS 1858; Transocean Mars 1833)

In regard to a future republic in Greece it was claimed in a late transmission that Churchill's intention was to propose Archbishop Demetrios as regent, since the ecclesiast, who presided at the Greek conference, was the only individual who enjoyed the confidence of both sides. Another report indicated that Churchill and Eden were returning to London to exert their influence on King George, who is living there at present in exile, to give his consent to a reunion in Greece. At the same time, it was claimed further, Premier Papandreou had telegraphed Bismarcs to resign his position to the Greek King, and assuming the leader of the liberal party, Thoudelos Sophoulidis, he was instructed with the formation of a new cabinet (Transocean Mars 2005; GHS 2012).

In the meantime, it was reported that the fighting in Athens did not let up, and that heavy shell fire continued throughout the night. This was seen as a realization of Churchill's prediction that if no agreement could be made with ELAS, "the cannon will continue to speak..." (DNB Hall 1862; 1837)

Pacific Front: Two transmissions carried reports of a strong Superfortress raid on Japan on Thursday evening, claiming that incendiary bombs had been dropped in the vicinity of Greater Tokyo. The details of damage caused or losses suffered by Allied planes were available, it was said (Transocean Mars 1858; DNB Hall 1832).

Several broadcasts announced that massive anti-aircraft batteries had shot down 22 American planes over Tsushima Island GHS 1850; GHS 1850). Two Soviet ships were claimed in a transmission to have been set afire by U.S. airmen in the course of an air attack over Kurekone last week. To indicate that the action was purposeful, the report emphasized that "bitter visibility prevailed during the attack, and so the Americans had been officially informed of the presence of the Soviet ships." (DNB Hall 1845).

ENEMY BROADCAST PROPAGANDA, TRENDS AND ANALYSIS

Covering Broadcasts from 0001 29 December to 0001 30 December

(Prepared by P & F Detachment)

1. WAR PROPAGANDA, TRENDS: At present the main concern of the German forces is to throw back strong Allied attacks on the northern and southern flanks of the German salient, according to Transocean's Sertorius. He alone admitted that the American Third Army had driven a narrow tank wedge to Bastogne and was trying to press north from that point. Sertorius was joined by Transocean's Walter Ploto in reporting strongest Allied pressure along the taker between Wiltz and Echternach. The preceding day's DBH admission of the loss of Echternach was repeated on no transmission. Ploto implied that the city was still in German hands by reporting increased American pressure on the city.

The German people were told in radio broadcasts that German advances had been made between Stavelot and Marche, and that American counterattacks at Rochefort, southwest and south of Bastogne, and along the Sauer in Luxembourg had been repulsed.

German propaganda broadcasts bunched quotations from Allied sources to assure the German people that their morale was high and that their strength was growing, and in contrast cited heavy American losses and Allied criticism of the Allied High Command.

Deputy Reichssprecher Chief Sunendorf referred to foreign workers inside Germany as "criminal helpers," which may mark a departure from recent admonitions to German people to treat these workers as fellow-fighters for the salvation of Europe.

2. ENEMY NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:

a. WEHRMACHT CONCENTRATES ON STOPPING ALLIED COUNTERATTACKS.

b. GERMAN STRENGTH HAS YET TO REACH ITS PEAK.

c. SOVIET TROOPS PUSH TOWARD INNER CIRCLE OF BUDAPEST.

d. GERMAN SET SIX BULLETS IN WEST ITALY DRIVE.

e. REGENCY PLAN CALLED CLOCK FOR FAILURE OF CHURCHILL'S TRIP.

f. ASSOCIATION OF FRENCHMEN FORMED TO PREVENT BOLSHEVIZATION.

g. ALLIES OIL QUESTION STAYED UNTIL ALLIED BROADCAST.

h. JAPANESE SPOKESMAN SAYS HOOD WILL TIGHTEN ON AMERICAN FORCES.

3. Western Front: In the new phase of the battle in southern Belgium and Luxembourg, the Germans are primarily concerned with checking Allied flank attacks, which are increasing in violence and are continually strengthened with new reserves, according to Transocean's Sertorius. Northwest and north of Le ROC and west of Stavelot bitter fighting continues, and obviously Bischoff, he reported, has thrown the greater part of the Ninth Army tank formations into this battle. It remains to be seen, Sertorius added, whether parts of Montgomery's British army group, "which has been conspicuously spared," will also be put into action here. There were no important changes in the situation on this flank, according to Sertorius.

American forces attacking the southern flank with great superiority failed to make a breakthrough, Sertorius stated, but added that after they had driven a narrow tank wedge to Bastogne, they attempted to attack northward from there. Toward the east, an extremely violent struggle is being waged for river crossings and the entire Sauer from south of Wiltz into the region of Echternach, with no "lasting successes" being gained by the Americans, according to Sertorius.

The Transocean reporter also stated that American counterattacks against the German spearhead west of Rochefort had been repulsed (Transocean 193), Transocean's Walter Ploto also reported increased violence of the American attacks against the German flanks, granting most importance to those between Wiltz and Echternach. He strictly denied yesterday's German admissions that Echternach had been evacuated by stating that "American pressure against Echternach also increased" (Transocean 193). German people were told that heavy fighting in the Belgium-Luxembourg area brought no substantial changes in the situation. Of the 44 American divisions on the western front, 26 were said to be employed in this area. German advances were claimed between Stavelot and Marche, and American counterattacks at Rochefort, south west and south of Bastogne, and along the Sauer in Luxembourg were said to have been repulsed. "Only in single sectors were the Americans able to gain some local ground," it was added (German conque).

The key evening broadcast stated that bad weather conditions and "the self sacrificing activity of German bombers" had decreased Allied air activity. This transmission also acknowledged "slight advance" of the Americans toward the road junction of Bastogne (GHS 2200).

Broadcasts to the German forces also acknowledged an advance toward Bastogne (GFS 1400, 1500), but announced continued German gains toward the Meuse and in the Belgian-Luxembourg area (GFS 1600, 1700). One transmission claimed complete success of the First phase of the German winter offensive in that it had scored a breakthrough of the First U. S. Army and had encircled and annihilated battle-experienced American forces units (GFS 2000).

An evening dispatch to the European press reported that all American activity on the northern flank had been stopped due to heavy losses suffered on the preceding day, but admitted that American attacks on the southern flank had been "that much stronger." Attacks "near Bastogne" were claimed smashed, but Americans wore granted a "slight extension" of a bridgehead north of the Saar (GHS Hall 2100).

One earlier press transmission admitted that "a certain stoppage of the German attack has set in" (IIB Hall 1550), and another stated that the Allies had finally again been granted a war of movement, but that it was not to their liking. It added:

"Today the war of movement is taking place in the rear of the enemy front at a great distance from the German industrial regions, which are important for war.

The Americans have driven numerous divisions from different sectors of the western front and thrown them into the battle. For the moment it is important to smash these strong flank attacks of the enemy in spite of strong enemy air activity, and to bring more forces into the battle and to destroy the enemy troops which are still resisting within the German lines" (IIB Hall 1580).

An article by Wilhelm Weiss in the Vossische Beeh cher concluded with the statement: "The general offensive of Eisenhower has been permanently smashed... The breakthrough in the west will go down in the history of war as a classic example of the art of going into the counteroffensive from the defense against an attacking and superior enemy and successfully regaining the initiative" (IIB Hall 0922).

Walter Pi to's statement regarding action on the remainder of the western front was typical:

"No fighting of importance took place Thursday in the Aachen or Saar areas. In Alsace fighting continued north of Colmar. In the Voges, French formations were driven back at Stiglesheim and Orsay in the course of local German attacks" (Transoccan Horse 1320).

Regarding the air war, Anglo-American bombers were said to have caused damage to "built-up" areas in Coblenz and Kaiserslautern, and British bombers reportedly attacked places in west Germany (German conque; Transoccan Horse 1207).

Smaller items on various transmissions plugged German novel activity. The use of special submarines by the Germans, named by von Osten "Assault Vikings," received increasing attention. They were credited with sinking 30,000 BRT of Allied shipping in the Scheldt estuary (German conque; GHS 2200; Transoccan Horse 0619; IIB Hall 0927, 1350, 1935).

b. German Home Front: German people were again assured that their morale was high and U-boat fighting strength had yet to reach its peak in many quotations ascribed to Allied and neutral sources. Wilfred von Owen, speaking in the "Review of the Situation," stated:

"Enemy war commentators say that Germany is only beginning to collect her strength, and that her spirit and determination are better than ever. A New York newspaper states that the word capitulation does not exist in the German dictionary. They have also come to realize that the hope for an early and often predicted breakthrough in German morale has not and never will happen." Present events, von Owen stated in quoting "an American writer," are weighing the Americans down like lead and their primary trouble is the terrific losses suffered by American armies. He stated that on additional worry was the loss of confidence in the Allied High Command, and reported American and especially English papers were openly criticizing the obstinacy of the American leaders chosen to direct the war on the western front.

After quoting General Marshall, World War I Chief of Staff, as saying that the war would not be over by 1945, von Owen continued:

"We look at the situation with calm and we afford to listen to the squabbles going on among our allies. We are proud and well pleased with our successes. We know that the blitzkrieg times of 1940 are over. We have learned that victories are won only through hard and bitter fighting, and we are prepared and willing to do the fighting."

Von Owen then turned to comment on the Churchill-Eden visit to Athens, stating that Churchill, shot at twice, should be thankful that ELLS leaders had not taught their men to shoot well. The visit accomplished nothing, according to von Owen, except to serve upon the establishment of a regency, but when this regency will be set up and what it will be good for no one, von Owen insisted, knows. The Allies promised food, peace, and prosperity, von Owen added, and bring, as Greece shows, fighting, death, and fear of typhus (GES 1235).

Deputy Reichspress Chief Saundersen, in an address to representatives of the foreign press, also pointed to the German winter offensive as proof that Germany will never capitulate. In further proof of Germany's strength, Saundersen stated that in addition to withstanding the attacks of three great powers, it "handled the criminal helpers in the interior of the Reich." This statement was significant in view of recent admissions to the German people to treat these workers well inasmuch as they were helping in the battle to save Europe (DUB Ht. 1752).

Von Owen's statements regarding heavy American losses and criticism of the Allied High Command were well supported by earlier reports in various transmissions. American losses up to 12 December were said to have been 600,000 men, and since then 100,000 more were reportedly lost. The 3d, 7th, and 9th American Tank Divisions, the 5th, 26th, and 106 Infantry Divisions were named as the heaviest sufferers. France's hospitals were said to be overcrowded with American wounded because Eisenhower's plan for more shipping space to transport wounded men back to the States had been delayed. A frantic call for 10,000 nurses in the United States was said to be arousing little response (GES 2000, 2200; GES 0700, 1600, 1800; DNB 1143, 1151, 1152, 1908).

An imminent showdown in the Allied High Command was intimated by German sources in quotations ascribed to Secretary of War Stimson as purportedly reported by The New York Times and the Boston radio (GES 2200; GES 1900; DNB 1200, 1242). "General Leary C. Noah, was reported as saying:

"There should be a stop to the talk in the U. S. A blaming the weather for all military setbacks. I have never yet experienced that snow falls on only one of the fighting sides." (GES 2200; DNB Bell 1942).

The "Front Reports" program told the German home audience that in spite of strong Allied attacks on the northern and southern flanks of the German salient, German forces were continuing to advance, that the Allies were trying hard to supply the isolated garrison of Bastogne by air, that Allied losses were terribly high, and that German losses were very small (GES 1930).

c. Eastern Front: German and Hungarian troops were reported holding the "inner circle" of Budapest as Soviet forces pushed into the Hungarian capital in bitter house to house fighting. The battle was said to be taking place on both banks of the Danube.

Transoxon's Karl Blachar claimed that the troops in Budapest were "holding their own against the violent attacks of the Soviets." Reporting activity on the remainder of the Hungarian Front, he said a Russian thrust westward from the sector between Lake Balaton and the Danube had been frustrated, and that north of the Big Bend of the Danube German formations had succeeded in withdrawing to the western bank of the Danube after fighting stubbornly against numerically superior Soviet forces. The Soviets were said to have been restricted to local attacks between the Bipol and the Sajo farther to the east, as well as in the north in Hungary (Transoxon Horse 1923).

In defensive actions in Hungary, the Germans were said to have destroyed 467 Soviet tanks in seven days, to have inflicted high losses in men and to have achieved a "defensive success" in containing the Russian drive (DNB Bell 1140, 1826).

Other press dispatches acknowledged the loss of the town of Szezsocna, which lies just south of the Slovakian border and north of Budapest. Offering more details on the Gran execution, the reports said that the Germans succeeded in removing all their material and that Soviet attempts to follow them across the river had failed. In Budapest, the Russians were reported suffering heavy losses in hand-to-hand fighting. "Every block of the city is like a fortress," said one dispatch (DNB Bell 1910, 1920).

In the Miskolc area northeast of Budapest, German airborne troops were credited with the capture of the town of Torna (GES 1280).

d. Italian Front: As German forces continued their mop-up operations in the Serchio Valley, it was announced that the new offensive on the western wing of the Italian front had brought them a gain of six miles in the first two days. The American 32d Division was said to have suffered heavy losses in men and material.
Units of the British Eighth Army were reported to have conducted weak attacks northeast of Pance yesterday, without making any significant gains (German censure; GOS 0865; GHS 2200; DNB Hall 1750).

A DNB dispatch quoted the Rome correspondent of the Spanish newspaper El Pueblo as saying that the financial situation is "extremely bad" in Allied-occupied Italy, and that "there are no indications that the Benedit government will cut to curb the ever-increasing inflation." The deficit of the Benedit budget was placed at 82 billion lire, or four and a half times as much as the income (DNB Hall 2334).

c. Southeastern Europe: Churchill's trip to Athens was described as a "complete failure" in numerous German transmissions, which pointed out that the attempt of the British press to headline the proposed regency only served to cloak the fact that the Prime Minister did not succeed in ending the civil war or achieving an agreement on a new Greek cabinet.

German press reports were quoted as referring to the unsuccessful mission as "Churchill's great disgrace," and it was suggested that although Churchill staked the weight of the British empire on his effort to force an agreement, he had not succeeded because of counter-pressure from the Soviet Union on the EAM representatives.

The Greek Prime Minister Papandrea was said to have resigned, and it was believed that Archbishop Damaskinos was preparing to take over the regency and to ask General Plastiras to form a new government (DNB Hall 1656, 1525, 1557, 1532, 1425, 1519, 1610, 1715, 1805, 2055; GHS 0700, 1600).

Meanwhile, fighting in Athens continued as the British forces attempted to clear the remainder of the city of EAM troops. After two hours of artillery fire, the British attacked Archbishop Hill on Friday, with strong tank support. New assaults were said to have been successful in clearing most of the central and southeastern parts of the city.

There were several reports of the discovery of a mass grave in Athens where the bodies were found of civilians who reportedly were murdered by the EAM at the beginning of the revolt (Transocean Hors 1234, 1700, 2000, 2200; DNB Hall 1222, 111, 1508, 1538, 1946, 1910).

d. Western Europe: A new organization was said to have been formed to represent the 2,000,000 Frenchmen on German soil who are determined to prevent the Bolshevization of France. Dispatches quoted a manifesto published in the newspaper Le France, in which the aim of the association, called the "Alliance Nationale-France," were reportedly published.

It was stated in the manifesto that Frenchmen "united" in Germany are uneasy concerning France's future, and that in order to ensure France's future greatness they were organizing their forces to fight Bolshevism's incursion in the De Gaulle government. To accomplish this aim, the manifesto stated, there is no alternative but to "side with Germany which is fighting the Bolshevist forces with incomparable heroism (Transocean Hors 1503; GHS 1600).

Propagandists continued to play up the bad conditions in Paris, mentioning the black market, widespread unemployment, the lack of coal and food and the increased number of murderers of high political leaders. The situation was reported worse in Holland, where the floods are spreading and the quality of food has become so serious that a famine is imminent (GHS 0700, 1900; DNB Hall 2239, 1936, 2200, 2885).

e. Political Front: Allied differences over the Serbian oil question were reported by German propagandists to be widening the breach between the Anglo-Americans and Russia. Seizing on the request of the British and American governments for more information from the Soviet on the transfer of equipment from the Serbian oilfields to Russia, the propagandists declared that the "conflict" on this matter is being regarded "as another indication of the lack of cooperation between the Allies."

It was pointed out that the British and American representatives have been playing a "minor role" in the Russian Arbitration Commission, while the Russians continue their exploitation of Russian property. The reports stated that although the Soviets have already taken some 26,000 tons of machinery, 20,000 railway cars, 365,000 tons of naphtha products and large stocks of weapons and other war materials, they are still not satisfied and are pressing the Russians for increased shipments. It was also claimed that the Russians have protested the failure of the Russians to abide by the arbitral conditions in shooting on government officials and taking action against war criminals and "rightist" elements (Transocean Hors 0837, 1655; DNB Hall 1048, 1439, 1501, 1651; GHS 2000).

The new Hungarian "counter-government" organized recently by General Miklos in
The Drehocolm was labeled by the Wilhelmstrasse spokesman as a Soviet-dominated "experiment" that would not succeed in winning constitutional control from the Salassi government. Mallois and Commissar cuss government, "experiment" Dobroczon the Japan posts for the Pacific campaigns, "noose" near ports of China, invasion of Greece, also might also attend the meeting (DNB Hell 1425, 1536, 1915).

Pacifica Front: In his final press conference of the year, the spokesman for the Japanese government was quoted as reaffirming the determination of Japan and Germany to fight the war to a victorious conclusion. Acknowledging that the Allied invasion of Europe had temporarily thrown the German forces back to their own borders, and that in the Pacific the Allies had seized valuable Japanese outposts during 1944, the spokesman pointed out that nevertheless both Germany and Japan can "still show on all battlefields that they have the situation well in hand."

Citing the German offensive in Belgium as an indication of the counterblows which Germany and Japan have in store for the Allies, the spokesman promised that the "resale" will be from tight around the American forces that have penetrated into the Japanese inner defense lines in the "decisive" Philippines operations.

The spokesman admitted that the Japanese had lost "valuable outposts" in the Marshall Islands and the Marianas, but stressed the heavy American losses in those campaigns. To balance these "defeats," he pointed to the Japanese successes in China, blandly stated "that the present war efforts are building the groundwork for final victory." (DNB Hell 1118; Transocean Morse 1217; GES 1700).

Several dispatches reported that the Japanese air force sank six American transports averaging 10,000 BRT each, and damaged two others, in an attack on a convoy near Mindanao, while off Leyte Island the U.S. Navy was said to have announced the loss of a destroyer and a landing barge (DNB Hell 1140, 1900; GES 1900).

A Transocean report by Ruben Ross from Shanghai noted the American landings at Palomar and Puerto Bello behind Japanese positions on Leyte, but it was stated that it would not be known for several days whether the new attacks had been successful (Transocean Morse 1350).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Adolf Hitler spoke to the German people just after midnight, breaking a six-month silence. He reiterated his fanatical resolve to fight the war to a successful conclusion and stated emphatically: "Germany will never capitulate."

The past 12 months were characterized as a "year of trial" by Dr. Goebbels in a New Year's speech delivered four hours before the Fuehrer's. He stated that Germany has won a "triumph of totality" during 1944 and has convinced the Allied leaders that it cannot be defeated.

German newspapers devoted a great amount of space to reviews of the year's events, highlighting their contention that the past year proved the failure of allied political guarantees and uncovered important weaknesses in the Allied position.

"Orders of the day" to the German forces were issued by Hitler, Goering, Field Marshal von Rundstedt, Admiral Dönitz and Chief of the General Staff Guderian.

Reports of activity on the western front said that fighting was concentrated in the Eastern and Rochefort sectors. For the first time a press dispatch mentioned the possibility that German forces would be cut off on the west if General Patton's column linked up with the First Army column along the Arlon-Liege road in Belgium.

2. ENEMY NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:

a. Hitler's Speech: Adolf Hitler broke his mysterious six-month silence just after midnight,Addressing the German people in the New Year and restating to them his fanatical resolve to fight the war to a successful conclusion.

The voice was unquestionably Hitler's, though it lacked the fire and mystique that once characterized his speeches. The twenty-five minute talk marked Hitler's first appearance before a microphone since 20 July, when he spoke briefly to assure the world that he had escaped the plot on his life.

In several places in his speech, the Fuehrer stated categorically that Germany will never capitulate in this war. He listed the Anglo-American and Bolshevik war aims—plans for Allied invasion of Germany, the transportation of 15 to 20 million Germans to foreign countries, the enslavement of the remainder of the German people, the "pillaging" of German youth and the destruction of millions of Germans—and declared these war aims meant that Germany had only the alternatives of "living in freedom or dying in slavery."

"The whole of the German people is aware of what would happen if we were ever to lose the war," said Hitler. "Therefore, they are determined not to lose the war, but must and shall win it. . . . We are clearly aware what we are fighting for, and are fighting for the preservation of the German being, for our homeland, for our two thousand year old culture, for our children and for their children, for all that makes a life worth living."

The interesting possibility that Hitler has already conceded the loss of Hungary as usually developed as a result of the speech. At two points, he mentioned Hungary in a complimentary list of nations that because of their cowardice and the weakness of their leaders had capitulated to the allies. Placing Hungary together with Italy, Finland, Rumania and Bulgaria as nations that collapsed during the year, Hitler indicated his recognition of the newly-announced provisional Hungarian government at Debrecen.

Offering some explanation of his long silence, Hitler said: "I may do myself to bring about success will be done in the future as in the past. Therefore I speak less today, not because I cannot speak or do not wish to speak, but because I believe that the duty-bound hand at every hour to direct all my efforts towards the aim of increasing the power of resistance of our people, in creating new weapons, in setting up new formations and mobilizing all forces that can be mobilized by any effort. My enemies will perhaps have survived already that I have not slept all this time."

Hitler credited the work and sacrifices of all the "Volksgenossen" at home and at the front with turning the tide of battle last August, when the enemy victory "seemed as close...and one catastrophe followed the other." Discussing Allied propaganda strategy, Hitler said the allies were using two propaganda methods to encourage their own side and discourage the Germans: 1. They set time limits for a German collapse (which they have been forced to revise innumerable times); 2. They set up admissions for the theoretical treatment of post-war questions, such as food distribution, traffic lines, laws of government, always making decisions "in such a way as to suggest that the war had already been won and that they had the time to think such measures.

The three factors in Germany which prevented any weakening on the basis of this propaganda, Hitler asserted, were the unified, decisive nature of the nation; the National Socialist ideal, which could not possibly be replaced by democratic pluralism; or Bolshevism, and the absence in Germany of "parlor politicians" who seize power by a coup d'etat and then capitulate to the enemy.

The Allied terror bombing of Germany was described by Hitler as the first step in the attempt to annihilate the Germans and a willful "rape of culture."

"They (the Allies) are already attempting to destroy us with means such as civilized mankind has never known before," said Hitler. "When they destroy our towns, they hope not merely to kill German women and children but above all to eliminate the elements of our one thousand-year-old culture."

Predicting that Germany will rise like the "Phoenix out of ashes" (an expression borrowed from ancient Greek article), Hitler said he knows that the German people has risen again and again from its deep abeyance, and that the German towns will rise again out of the ruins and become new emblems of German splendor. National Socialism will rebuild more beautiful cities than ever, he promised, with healthier homes and more social and cultural facilities than they ever had before.

Again pointing to the heavy burdens of 1944, Hitler said it was the year that proved that "bourgeois society is no longer in a position to face the storms of the present time." He went on to outline the apocalyptic position of democracy in this decade, and asserted that its fate of "how social aims in life shows the lack of the moral will to resistance of the peoples and their leaders."

The building of a German future depends on the rapid development of our peoples' state," he continued. "The numberless sacrifices which our peoples have to make can only be made honorably in the sacrifice of a new order of society which goes away with all the privileges and thus makes the whole people not only the bearer of the old duties, but also possessors of the same rights of life."

The novel value of the German conviction of a social community was credited by Hitler with providing the "strong faith and unshakeable confidence" that enabled the German people to continue the struggle in their most difficult hours and to produce what will become known in history as "the German miracle."

He reviewed the accomplishments of the fighting units at the front, the Volksthun, the People's artillery corps, the pick-ax-shovel battalions, and the factory workers, assuring that a "people which has accomplished such deeds at the front and from the home front can never be destroyed."

Appealing to the people to continue their efforts with the "utmost fanaticism," Hitler reassured the Germans that his faith in final victory is unshakable. Rationalizing that in view of Allied conquests to such hard tests has been called for the highest places, Hitler thanked God for giving Germany and himself strength to carry on and take on with "in the presence of the Almighty" that victory will come finally "to him who is most worthy of it, the Greater German Reich."("GHS 0006, 9.

Eastern Front: The possibility that German forces might be cut off by a potential link-up of the First and Third American armies on the Arlon-Liège road in Belgium was mentioned last night for the first time in a German press transmission.

It is clear that it is expected that the First Army will launch an attack shortly in the Grandmonil sector, the dispatch suggested that if General Patton simultaneously carries out his intention of advancing northward from Bastogne to Houffalize, all the German forces to the west would be isolated. Both Grandmonil and Houffalize lie on the main road leading north from Arlon to Liège.

The day's principal fighting was said to be taking place at Bastogne, where several German armored formations were reported attacking the "open flank of the American divisions." A DIB admission two days ago that Bastogne's garrison had been relieved by American columns was hereby denied, and it was stated that the enemy could not break the German line around the city and that the pipeline was closing on the units trapped in Bastogne.

An American attack on Homburgh, southwest of Bastogne, was said to have cost Americans 84 tanks, while in Luxembourg, large-scale battles were reported in the town of Remich, near the border with Luxembourg.
1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Adolf Hitler spoke to the German people just after midnight, breaking a six-month silence. He reiterated his fanatical resolve to fight the war to a successful conclusion and stated emphatically: "Germany will never capitulate."

The past 12 months were characterized as a "year of trial" by Dr. Goebbels in a New Year's speech delivered four hours before the Führer's. He stated that Germany has won a "triumph of tenacity" during 1944 and has convinced the Allied leaders that it cannot be defeated.

German newspapers devoted a great amount of space to reviews of the year's events, highlighting their contention that the past year proved the failure of Allied political guarantees and uncovered important weaknesses in the Allied position.

"Orders of the day" to the German forces were issued by Hitler, Goering, Field Marshal von Rundstedt, Admiral Doenitz and Chief of the General Staff Guderian.

Reports of activity on the western front said that fighting was concentrated in the Bastogne and Rochefort sector. For the first time a press dispatch mentioned the possibility that German forces would be cut off in a sector if General Patton's column links up with the First Army column along the Arlon-Liège road in Belgium.

Hitler's Speech: Adolf Hitler broke his mysterious six-month silence just after midnight, breaking the German people in the New Year and reiterating to them his fanatical resolve to fight the war to a successful conclusion.

The voice was unquestionably Hitler's, though it lacked the fire and exhilaration that once characterized his speeches. The twenty-five minute talk marked Hitler's first appearance before a microphone since 20 July, when he spoke briefly to assure the world that he had escaped the plot on his life.

At several points in his speech, the Führer stated emphatically that Germany will never capitulate in this war. He listed the Anglo-American and Bolshevik war aims--planes for splitting up Germany, the transportation of 15 to 20 million Germans to foreign countries, the enslavement of the remainder of the German people, the "poisoning" of young and old, and the destruction of millions of Germans--and declared that war aims meant that Germany had only the alternatives of "living in freedom or dying in slavery."

"The whole of the German people is aware of what would happen if we were ever to lose the war," said Hitler. "Therefore, they are determined to do not lose the war, but must and shall win it...... We are clearly aware what we are fighting for. We are fighting for the preservation of the German being, for our homeland, for our two thousand year old culture, for our children and for their children, for all that makes life worth living."

The interesting possibility that Hitler has already conceded the loss of Hungary as an early development as a result of the speech, at two points, he mentioned Hungary in a deprecatory list of nations that because of their cowardice and the weakness of their leaders had capitulated to the Allies. During Hungary together with Italy, Finland, Roumania and Bulgaria as nations that collapsed during the year, Hitler indicated his recognition of the newly-announced provisional Hungarian government at Debreczen.

Offering some explanation of his long silence, Hitler said: "What I can do myself to bring about success will be done in the future as in the past. Therefore I speak less today, not because I cannot speak or do not want to speak, but because I believe that I am duty-bound at every hour to direct all my efforts towards the aim of increasing the power of resistance of our people, of creating new weapons, of getting up new formations and mobilizing all forces that can be mobilized by any effort. My enemies will perhaps have pondered already that I have not all the time."
Hitler credited the work and sacrifices of all the "Volksgenossen" at home and at the front with turning the tide of battle last August, when the enemy victory "seemed so close...and one catastrophe followed the other." Discussing Allied propaganda strategy, Hitler said the Allies were using two propaganda methods to encourage their own side and discourage the Germans: 1. They set time limits for a German collapse (which they have been forced to revise innumerable times); 2. They set up commissions for the theoretical treatment of post-war questions, such as food distribution, traffic lines, laws of government, always making decisions "in such a way as to suggest that the war had already been won and they had the time to weigh such measures."

The three factors in Germany which prevented any weakening on the basis of this propaganda, Hitler asserted, were the unified, decisive nature of the nation; the National Socialist ideal, which could not possibly be replaced by democratic plutocracy or Bolshevism; and the absence in Germany of "parlor politicians" who seize power by a coup d'état and then capitulate to the enemy.

The Allied terror bombing of Germany was described by Hitler as the first step in the attempt to annihilate the Germans and a willful "rape of culture."

"They (the Allies) are already attempting to destroy us with means such as civilized mankind has never known before," said Hitler. "When they destroy our towns, they hope not merely to kill German women and children, but above all to eliminate the documents of our one thousand-year-old culture."

Promising that Germany will rise like the "phoenix out of ashes" (an expression borrowed from a recent Gibbels article), Hitler said he knew that the German people has risen again and again from its deep misery, "and that the German towns will rise again out of the ruins and become new monuments of German splendor."

National Socialism will rebuild more beautiful cities than ever, he promised, with healthier homes and more social and cultural facilities than they ever had before.

Again pointing to the heavy burdens of 1944, Hitler said it was the year that proved that "bourgeois society is no longer in a position to face the storms of the present time." He went on to outline the anachronistic position of democracy in this decade, and asserted that its lack of "new social aims in life shows the lack of the moral will to resistance of the people and their leaders."

"The building of a German future depends on the logical development of our peoples' state," he continued. "The merciless sacrifices which our peoples have to make can only be made bearable on the promise of a new order of society which does away with all the privileges and makes the whole people not only the bearers of the same duties, but also possessors of the same rights of life."

The moral value of the German conviction of a social community was credited by Hitler with providing the "strong faith and unshakable confidence" that enabled the German people to continue the struggle in their most difficult hours and to produce what will become known in history as "the German miracle."

He reviewed the accomplishments of the fighting units at the front, the Volkssturm, the People's artillery corps, the pick-and-shovel battalions, and the factory workers, asserting that a "people which has accomplished such deeds at the front and in the homeland can never be destroyed."

Appealing to the people to continue their efforts with the "almost fanaticism," Hitler reassured the Germans that his faith in final victory is unshakable. Rationalizing that he was a likewise subject to such hard tests has been called for the highest places, Hitler thanked God for giving Germany and himself strength to carry on and took an oath "in the presence of the Almighty" that victory will come finally "to him who is most worthy of it, the Greater German Reich"(268 0005).

b. Western Front: The possibility that German forces might be cut off by a potential link-up of the First and Ninth American armies on the Arlon-Lièges road in Belgium was mentioned last night for the first time in a German press transmission.

Aviating that it is expected that the First Army will launch an attack shortly in the Grandmont sector, the dispatch suggested that if General Patton simultaneously launches his intention of advancing northward from Bastogne to Houthulst, all the German forces to the west would be isolated. Both Grandmont and Houthulst lie on the main road leading north from Arlon to Lièges.

The day's principal subject was said to be taking place at Bastogne, where several German armed formations were reported attacking the "deep flank" of the American divisions. A Verdun admission two days ago that Bastogne's garrison had been relieved by American columns was tactfully denied, and it was stated that the garrison could not break the German "ring" around the city and that the pincers was closing on the units trapped in Bastogne.

An American attack at Hurne, southwest of Bastogne, was said to have cut the Americans's memory, while in Luxembourg, large-scale battles were reported developing as the result of American movements northward on the Northvill-Wiltz road and new attempts to extend the Sauer River bridgehead.
Other transmissions stressed the over-increasing ferocity of enemy attacks, despite the "intense cold and deep snow." It was stated that "the Americans have thrown into the fighting all forces from other sectors in an effort to narrow down the base of the German Wehrmacht." (DIEB 1121, 1122, 1128, 1315, 1846)

The communiques, likewise emphasizing the heavy fighting south of Bastogne, pointed out that both sides are bringing such strong forces into "the winter battle between the Fles and Moselle," that half of all divisions in the western sector are now engaged in this sector. It stated that the focal points are at Bastogne and Rochefort (German corps), a forces broadcast stated that the Americans were unable to improve their line at Rochefort (GFS 2200).

The hint that activity has been revived in the northern sector was contained in a report that the Germans penetrated into the town of Fritzlar, north of Geilenkirchen, and captured 50 prisoners (DIEB 1121, 1846).

Transocean war report Gerhard Emsketter acknowledged that activity on the southern sector remained a "question mark," but went on to state that the German offensive in Baltra had forced Eisenhower to withdraw "a considerable portion of his forces from the Seine front line." He said the remaining units, numbering about seven divisions of infantry, have taken a front line between Merzig and the Saar, and that they are subjected to daily attacks by German shock troops (Transocean 1211).

The day's transmissions included reports of air and sea activity, which were reviewed as follows in the communiques: "American bomber! were over western and southern Germany during the day and attacked Kassel and Kusel and the Ruhr factories, as well as other locations, during the night British formations dropped bombs on Coblenz. Baltra raids were directed against Emden, Bremerhaven, and other targets. The enemy air attacks continued to be answered by v-bombs over London.

"German submarines continued their heavy battles against enemy supplies. In the waters around England, they sank six ships of 25,000 tons, among them a freighter laden with ammunition" (German communique DDEB 1115, 1142; GFS 2000; GFS 2200).

a. German Home Front: Germany has won a "triumph of tenacity" in its year of trial during 1944, and it was concluded the Allied leaders that it cannot be beaten and is destined for victory, Dr. Goebbels declared last night in a talk to the home audience.

Snatching four hours before the appearance of Hitler, the Reichsminister likewise declared that "the German people will not lay down its arms until their victory is firmly within its grasp." However much we love peace, he added, it must and will be a victorious peace of which we do not have to be ashamed.

Germany's proximity to defeat during the months from June to September was reflected by Dr. Goebbels when he declared that the tests to which the nation was subjected during that period would have been sufficient to destroy any other nation. He listed the enemy invasion, his offensive and breakthrough of the Siegfried line, the attacks on Hitler, the breakthrough at Ardennes, the "advance" of Russian, Italian, and Polish and the Russian advance into East Prussia.

Feinting out if this series of events could not "shock" the German people, nothing else would, Dr. Goebbels said: "In these will storms, our people stand firm like a rock in the sea. Our enemies think it that the route to Berlin is clear. Over and over again were accepted in London and Washington on the proposition that the war would be over in October, that all war production was already being reconsumed to peacetime needs. Christmas will have been anticipated in London. In this formula which went on all around us, the German myth arose like a mirage. What the enemy could never understand became a fact. The German people and its leaders did not even think of capitulation. On the contrary, with an unprecedented effort they regained firm ground. The idea proved triumphant over asked power."

Dr. Goebbels opened his talk with the statement that the end of 1944 finds the affective world in a "triumph" situation, because the deceived peoples of Europe have discovered that the arrival of the Anglo-American armies has only brought them "hunger, misery and political chaos." Stating that the crisis of civilization can be seen in a single event, he reported that a crew of "brainless" American soldiers stole gold in precious near Germany, after keeping a "cultural renunciation," and did not even know the name of the town which they had stolen from the "priceless monument" which they had built.

It was stressed by Dr. Goebbels that the ability of Germany to strike an offensive blow was not a mirage, but the result of "our faith, in our fight, and our work." In these heroic hours, he said, the finish not only proved stronger than anyone had believed, but also proved that it would not perish.

"We have literally held on to the soil of our homeland, and that is why the homeland has remained with us and will be our's in the future," declared Dr. Goebbels. "We have not folded our hands and waited for a miracle, we have allowed the German miracle to ripple as a result of our industry and our bravery."

Dr. Goebbels again went into lengthy praise of the Führer, describing him as a "historic genius" who is not of the ilk of the "real men who chance mankind."

In these times, he said, "there is not a single personality who could even be compared to the Führer... he is the symbol and personification of his time."

Claiming that the Allied power which once seemed invincible has now passed its peak, Dr. Goebbels stated: "They (the Allies) are united only in their hatred, in their diabolical mills of destruction, which is directed against everything which they feel superior to themselves. They can destroy and burn, but they have not the power to create something new and something better in the midst of a destroy world. That is why they will fail."

The momentous events of July 20, when Hitler narrowly escaped death, were pictured by Goebbels as the moment when Germany sank into a "doom abyss," only to emerge with a new faith. From that time, all the people were pictured uniting in their effort and in their faith and confidence in victory. "Thus the year 1944 has subjected us to hard schooling," said Dr. Goebbels, "it has inflicted blows on us, but it has also led us back to our own true soul."

Reiterating Germany's determination to fight until victory, Goebbels reminded the Allies that victory is not won until the last round and that as the year 1945 dawns they will face a unified Germany, one created by the fire of war and hardened by its blows, and one prepared to fight for a "new and blossoming time in German history" (GES 2016).

Goebbels' theme that the "liberation" has brought only political chaos to Europe received further qualification in German newspaper reviews of the year's events.

The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung pointed out that Germany's war aim is a Greater German Reich that will insure European autonomy and independence, asserted that the allies have failed in their political guarantees during 1944, as well as in their military promises. Roosevelt's abandonment of the Atlantic Charter, Churchill's failure in Greece and the gradual Bolshevization of Europe were offered as evidence of the political instability of the Allied program. It was stated that America has come to Europe for commercial gains and that Russia is seeking political advantages, while Great Britain's existence is being threatened by her alleged allies (GES Heil 1930).

In a study of Allied weaknesses during the past year, die Zeit vom Erhöhter Rang listed six principal factors:
1. The nations of the world realized that the Atlantic Charter was betrayed.
2. The "liberation" of Europe turned into a tragedy for the nations concerned.
3. The conferences in the United States proved their impotence.
4. Enemy soldiers at least admitted that they have no idea why they are fighting.
5. British complacency received a hard blow, and while Churchill "travels about the world like a pedlar and baw," the Soviet's influence continues to grow.
6. America realized that it faces a hard, bitter and long war, which will require tremendous sacrifice, and that the future is uncertain.

After stressing the line that wherever the American and British armies went during the past year the Soviets were ready to take advantage of need and chaos to "harvest the crop into their own barns," the article declared that only the continued resistance of Japan and Germany offered hope to the peoples of the earth (GES Heil 1936).

Quotations from British and American newspapers, evidencing self-criticism and disunity among the allies, were highlighted in transmissions for the European press.

The London Sunday Times was quoted as acknowledging that the Allied High Command was "caught sleeping" by the German offensive, principal allied troubles at the present time were said to be the shortage of shipping space and the commitment of so much artiller to the Pacific war at a time when it is needed in the Atlantic (GES Heil 1936).

Roosevelt's pointed out the decrease of "warth" between Britain and America during 1944, using as examples the Kogoneth-Koyos agreements at the Brettin Wood conference; disputes at Dumbarton Oaks; the blocking of the Anglo-American oil agreement by the U. S. Senate; the failure of the International Air Conference at Chicago, and the official criticism by Stettinius of British policy in Italy and Greece (GES Heil 1916).

The statement that "Roosevelt and his advisors have miscalculated on a gigantic scale" was purported to have been made by the American correspondent of the Daily Mail. He attributed to Thomas E. Dewey an admission and he was "lucky he had not been elected, for he would have been blamed for giving the Germans the courage to attack, for Allied disunity and the shortages of war material (DNB Hell 2110).

The neglect of Allied intelligence is allowing a "surprise" German offensive to have been criticized in the Spectator by the British military writer Strato-Kuss. He also attacked the radio news, repeatedly stating that "the silence of our military authorities creates the impression on the whole world that news from the fronts is dead" (Transpennine Morse 0850; DNB Hell 0925).

A long home service program entitled "The Fronts at the Change of the Year" attempt to present a picture of the situation on each of the three fronts on which German forces are fighting. In the week, it was staged, the mortal steam-roller of the Allies rolled forward uninterruptedly after the June invasion, and the world believed it could not be stopped. "Then there arose the so-called German miracle," the broadcast continued, and with the fall of Germany at stake the nation stood by as one not to present an iron wall against the attacker. "These batters have proved that the values and forces of the German soul are stronger than the dead and spiritless material of our enemy."

Referring to the Italian fighting, it was said that the nation there is marked by the valiant defensive spirit of Cassino and Rinaldi, and that the German forces in the south are holding to "inhabit" the advance of the superior enemy. On the eastern front, the German soldier was said to be fighting more courageously now because "he knows where he is standing...he is standing in Germany, yes on German soil." The broadcast was concluded with talks by a soldier of the Waffen SS from Holland, stating his desire to fight on during the coming year for the new order in Europe, and a sailor on a U-boat, pointing out that the U-boats are continuing their battles and are tying down large fractions of the enemy navy (GHS 1945).

Other items continued to play up the Allied losses in juxtaposition to growing German strength, as shown in the rebirth of the Luftwaffe, the fighting spirit of the Wehrmacht and the growth of industry (GHS 1230, 2000; GFS 0800, 1600).

c. German Forces: The five leaders of the German military effort issued dramatic "orders of the day" on the eve of the New Year, pledging the nation's forces to fight on with determination until victory is won.

Short summaries of these "orders" follow:

Roilostradler Hitler, to the Wehrmacht: "The German people is today engaged in a Fight for Life and Death...The enemy has plans for the extermination of the German people, by latticing up the country or by annihilation through terror bombing... He shall succeed in breaking the power of the army with our counterattacks this year...1945 will remain the extreme in courage and determination, but it will also be the year of the historic turning point" (DNB Hell 0200).

Air Marshal Göring to the Luftwaffe: "During these days we see the ripening of the first fruits of the Luftwaffe...The new year, therefore, prove that we are fighting with our full proven strength...are determined to fight for our beloved Führer with all our strength until final victory" (DNB Hell 0215).

Field Marshal von Rundstedt, to troops on the Western Front: "One of the hardest years of the war is past, and we have overcome its difficulties...to enter the New Year in full confidence...The German soldier will increase his efforts, never slacken never give in, until the enemy is beaten" (DNB Hell 0904; GFS 1600).

Chief Admiral Doenitz, to the Navy: "A very important year is behind us...The German people had many severe tests, but the genius of the Führer has mastered all crises...His will is the rule for our navy...To will attack the enemy wherever we find him, with a fanatic courage that will lead to our victory" (DNB Hell 0250).

Galland, Chief of the General Staff: "The enemy has advanced to the frontiers of the Reich...But his intention to smash our resistance was broken by the will to resist of the German soldier...Every inch of German soil is being defended determinedly...At the same time, the German people behind the front created a new, insurmountable defense system, the true Fortress Germany" (DNB Hell 0215).

c. Eastern Front: German propagandists found little to report from the Russian and Urals sectors yesterday limiting themselves to the phrase; "Fierce fighting is taking place with heavy casualties suffered by the Bolsheviks." However, it was reported that in the course of the "defensive battle" west and north of its extent, the Soviets lost 1,000 tanks from 23 December to 27 December.

Soviet gains by the Soviets admitted in the area between the Oren and Saj rivers and in the Sivasian front between the towns of Saiast and Akulian (DNB Hell 1197, 11; 05 1; 11; 7, 1200; GHS 1138; GFS 2000; German Chung). The "Szlaski Fronts" were given special mention in one overseas transmission and praised for fighting "shoulder to shoulder" with German units, indicating the report concluded, that followers of the Szlaski regime were ready to fight for their convictions (Transactions Morse 1538).
f. Italian Front: An attempted landing by the Fifth Army on the Ligurian coast south of Massa was reported in the communiqué and two transmissions. The assaulting force, it was said, which consisted of two companies and was intended to land troops behind the main German battle line, was driven back (DNB 1618; GFS 2200; German Corse).

General Kesselring was reported to have said in an order of the day that the German soldier in Italy could look back with pride on the past year. Cassino and Rimini are some of the names of his fame, he was quoted as saying (GFS 1600).

The German press was told that on Christmas Day, Anglo-American bombers struck at the towns of Milan, Turin, Mantua, Brescia, and Vicenza, killing 84 persons (Transocean Morse 1225).

g. Southeastern Europe: The British News Agency was quoted as having officially announced that General Soebio had answered the note which the E.M. had addressed to Churchill. Soebio was said to have declared that when the E.M. confirmed the acceptance of his conditions, only then would steps be taken (DNB 1618).

E.M. was reported to have said, according to Reuters, that the recent conference "has been spoiled by the old political world, which has as her aim the arrival at decisions through force based on British arms" (1117).

In the meantime, heavy fighting in the Athens area was reported in German broadcasts. E.L.M. was said to be in possession of the whole of northern Greece, while another report claimed that E.L.M. was continuously on the offensive in Epirus (GFS 0816; GHS 1400; GFS 1600).

h. Political Front: Radio Lublin was quoted, in a report attributed to Reuters, as saying that the Polish National Council in Lublin voted on Sunday for the transformation of the council into a "Provisional Government of the Polish Republic." It was added that Karwinski, who had been president of the Lublin Committee, now headed the new government and held the additional post of foreign minister (DNB 1618).

i. Western Europe: With regard to the plan for future world security, a correspondent of The New York Times was credited with the report that Stalin counted on DeGaulle's support of the Soviet Union's point of view, which is namely: the security plan worked out at Dumbarton Oaks should allow to each big power accused of aggression the right to determine guilt, with other powers as judges. DeGaulle was reported to have agreed to this plan, which is not recognized by Washington or London (DNB 1618).

Quotations from the Swiss newspaper Journal de Genève were used to accuse DeGaulle and his foreign minister, Bidault, of encouraging the "external hostility between the French and German nations," Bidault was quoted as demanding French participation in future control of German territory, particularly the Palatinate and Rhine regions and "a considerable portion" of the Rhenish plain. Chemical, biological, and physical laboratories were also to be included, it was said (DNB 1618, 1923).

j. Pacific Front: Predicting that the situation in the Philippines was heading "with increasing speed towards a climax," a report to the overseas press attributed to Tokio, reported that the Leyte battle was still in progress and was concentrated in the northwestern part of the island.

The transmission went on to mention the failure of "new landings northwest of Leyte near Palompon and San Isidro" and predicted that Allied landings on Luzon were to be expected in the very near future (Transocean Morse 1223).

The Shanghai correspondent for the United Press was quoted to have said that for China 1944 was the darkest part of the past eight years of war. China lost the greater part of three important provinces, Hunan, Hsuan and Kwang, and eight important air bases, while the Americans, he reportedly said, had been driven into China's western mountains (DNB 1141).

Transmissions during the day claimed that the Japanese Kamikaze corps had sunk eight transports and two cruisers off the coast of Mindoro, while a late evening broadcast announced that of a 38 ship convoy off Mindoro, 18 ships had been sunk (DNB 1618; GHS 1600; 2200; GHS 2000).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: New activity by German forces in the Saar, Blimit and Lower Moselle sectors was cited as evidence that the initiative on the western front had passed to the German High Command. It was pointed out that the most important outcome of the German winter drive had been that it forced Eisenhower to shift his forces and therefore to abandon his offensives in the Lower Moselle and Saar areas.

Although it was stated that the Germans had made only "local attacks" in the southern sector, gains of territory were reported on both sides of Blies and at Saargemünd. In the north, the focal point of the fighting continued to be at Emscher, where the Americans were reported pressing with eight divisions in an effort to advance toward Düsseldorf.

The mighty air blow by the Luftwaffe on New Year's day was said to have caused the Allies some consternation as to their "absolute air superiority." The greatness of the attack and extent of the destruction were reported to be clearly in aerial photographs.

In a domestic broadcast, Dr. Joseph Soul declared that the Anglo-American defeat to Soviet Russia on the Polish and Greek questions had exposed the Atlantic Charter as a meaningless and empty document.

a. Western Front: Allied abandonment of all offensive plans in the Saar and Rhine because of shifts of forces necessitated by the German drive in Belgium was viewed as the most important outcome of the German counter-offensive, and it was stated that as a result the initiative on the western front has now passed to the German High Command.

This thesis was developed in the evening DNB transmission, which went on to point out that the new picture of the fighting in the Stier, Emscher and Lower Moselle sectors "illuminates with clarity the basic changes" that have occurred. It was shown that when General Eisenhower withdrew formations from other sectors to meet the German drive he lost the role of aggressor all along the front and was unable to regain it in the Luxemburg-Belgian salient (DNS 1945).

BNB's military commentator, Dr. Max Krull, tending to play down the new German move in the Saar-Stier sector as "local attacks," nevertheless placed added emphasis on the theme that the German command has now assumed the initiative. Stating that the "deaths of assault divisions" in the Ardennae has developed into a stationary situation in which both sides are fighting stubbornly with their heaviest weapons, Dr. Krull wrote: "The relieved of the entire front continues and the situation at present shows that the German command will decide at which point it will become offensive again. A constant insecurity has been created in the enemy ranks, which gives a new note to the fighting and again and again causes regrouping by the Americans."

Referring to activity in the southern sector, Dr. Krull said German movements on the Saar and in the Lower Moselle have not yet shown the extent of the German plan, and added that gains of territory on both sides of Bletter and at Saargemünd that have brought the Germans to the southern edge of the Saar-Limmat could only be considered local in nature.

Dr. Krull reported that Messerschmitt's attacking force is still concentrated in the Saar-Limmat area, while on the northern flank the situation is stable between Saarbrücken and Melunéy, while on the southern flank the Allies are pushing against the St. Hubert-Bastogne-Malmedy Line. It was stated that the immediate goal is to relieve "more decisively" the name in Bastogne, presently connected "by a small corridor" with the main body (DNS 1945).
The action at Bastogne was described as a "great battle" in DNB dispatches, which claimed that American reinforcements had opened up the "ring around the city" at several places and that German tanks continued to attack stubbornly. It was stated that "the greater part of an American armored division was destroyed in the area of Bastogne, and that to the west of the city the villages of Malmont and Millmont were recaptured by the Germans (DNB Hall 1950, 2039).

The objective of the American drive at Bastogne was said to be the town of Houffalize on the Sauer-Liege road, and it was claimed that Mussolini's cavalry concentrated for tank and four infantry divisions west of Bastogne in an effort to break through the German defenses for the push in that direction (DNB Hall 1950, 1960).

The communiqué, adding that the Allies have lost 100 tanks in the action at Bastogne, listed enemy losses during the winter battle of the Ardennes as follows: 400 guns, 1,350 tanks and tank vehicles, 24,000 prisoners, and 50,000 dead (German communal).

Transocean's Ludwig Settrius, likewise emphasizing American pressure against the Bastogne region and the failure of the breakthrough attempt to Houffalize, said that the battle of the Ardennes has not yet reached its climax and mentioned the possibility of the resumption of a major German attack.

Commenting on the absence of concentrated artillery fire by the Americans during the winter campaign, Settrius attributed this development to DNB dispatches in supplying the Allies because of shelling of Allied personnel positions; the effects of German aerial attacks could, as supply depots, air rights, and partisan activities. He also pointed out that possibly Mussolini did not have the means to concentrate because of munitions systematically, as he had before his own large-scale attacks.

Because of the absence of artillery, Settrius reassured the Americans were forced to employ additional tank formations. These, he said, are not sufficient for extensive "tank and tank" and thereby neutralize better for new Allied offensives. Furthermore, he explained, Mussolini would need the same kind of tank attack that the Germans would launch a new offensive following the heavy air attacks in France or Belgium for the local actions in the Plateau (Transocean's Settrius 1952).

German successes in breaking through American defense positions along the Alsace-Lorraine border, east of the Ser, and in the north of Meuse, south of the Maginot Line, were reported by Transocean's General Mussoott. Stressing again the day's principal theme, "territorial gains in the upper Ser are an outcome of the battle in Belgium," Mussoott said the fighting in the past weeks had shown that "the enemy was unable to donate one section of his front without more risk to his forces.

The Germans in the Meuse sector were said to be advancing slowly because of heavy minefields, and engagements were reported taking place in "bitter cold weather" (Transocean's Mussoott 1952).

The communiqué reported that the Ser bridgehead northwest of Forbach had been enlarged and consolidated, that the frontier zone northeast of Saarbruecken was cleared of the enemy and that the German offensive is "progressing" in the lower Meuse.

Press transmissions added that the German troops liberated the villages of Frankenau and Kleinschmiede northeast of Saarbruecken, and that in the area of Hulsch von German attacks pushed the enemy further to the south (DNB Hall 1950, 1950, 1950, 1466, 1562, 1960).

A DNB dispatches offered a report by a minister of a small village in the hills "liberated by German troops after a short occupation by the Americans," in which were reported the "deeds" of American soldiers.

The report stated, "After officials and members of the party had been arrested and deported, the rest of the population, consisting mainly of women and children, was subjected to plundering and blackmail. Claiming that they were obliged to stop enslavement, the Americans forced the inhabitants to live continuously in cells. In the meantime, they plundered the apartments.

"One of the soldiers said to the population in German that the war is being waged without mercy against all of Germany, the German women, children and old people, as well as the German soldiers. This type of warfare shall be seen in the actions of the Americans when they were to make a last departure. They destroyed the waterworks pipes and shot at the women, children and old people with phosphorous shells. Those people had been driven together on American orders into the parsonage for religious services. Only a few inhabitants will be saved by the commanding German soldiers from the ruins of the burning parsonage." (DNB Hall 1960)."
b. Air War: The mighty New Year's day attack by the Luftwaffe against Anglo-American air bases in Belgium and northern France has caused some consternation among the Allies, as to their "absolute air superiority," which until now has been the most advantageous factor in their war effort, stated Dr. Krull in a DNB war commentary.

In dozens of dispatches reviewed the success of the air blow, in which approximately 400 American and British planes were reportedly destroyed, Dr. Krull asserted that the "proximity of the attack" and the "extent of the destruction" were seen even more clearly in aerial photographs. He stated that the revived activity of the Luftwaffe is marked "by the carelessness of the planning and the elasticity of the execution" (DNB Hull 1913).

A fresh broadcast quoted a staff officer of the German High Command explaining the attack as follows: "In the early hours of 1 January, hundreds of enemy bombers, fighter bombers, and fighter planes were standing on aerodromes in France and Belgium, ready to take off, because the American Third and Seventh Armies had asked for supporting aircraft. In five different waves, Luftwaffe planes came over and wrought havoc among the enemy planes. Most of them were destroyed on the ground, while a number were shot down in the course of dog-fights. Huge amounts of bombs were dropped and considerable commotion fired" (GOS 1939).

The New Year's blows were said to have been called the "first test by the Luftwaffe since the invasion" in reports in the British press, as they essential installations, including large dumps, were said to have been destroyed, in addition to the planes.

On the evening of 2 January, the Luftwaffe was said to have carried out new successes in attacks on Allied communication and supply lines in France and Belgium. Minotaur narcotics were reported destroyed at 82 others rendered unusable (GOS 1939; GFS 1900; 1100, 1600; GFS 2000; DNB Hull 1913).

Several communiques again played up the continued fire of V-weapons over London, and an American correspondent was quoted as stating that the "blows of war" have become even more apparent in England. "V-bombs" were also said to be interrupting Allied traffic between Largo and London and the front (GOS 1939; GFS 1900, 1600; GFS 1900, 2800).

On the Allied side of the picture, reports continued to stress the Anglo-American bomber raids over Germany (German commun; GFS 1900; GFS 1900; DNB Hull 1913). The communiqué stated: "Northwestern German zones dropped bombs on eastern Germany, and residential districts of several towns were hit. Low-level planes continued their beam-operations streams against the civilian population. During the evening British and German attacks were directed against the prevalent. Serious damage was caused to buildings, and the civilian population suffered casualties. Irresistible cultural monuments were destroyed because of the knockdown destructive tonnage of the enemy. British heavy bombers also attacked towns in southwestern Germany and Nazi fighter-bombers attacked Berlin. Anti-aircraft defenses shot down 22 enemy planes yesterday, among them 14 four-engined bombers."

Reviewing the air activity in December, the communiqué noted that the Anglo-Americans lost 1,373 planes, including 410 four-engined bombers, in raids last month over the battle area and German territory.

c. German News Front: The Anglo-American defeat to Soviet Russia on the Polish and Greek Question units impose the Atlantic Charter as a meaningless document and prove the emptiness of the Allied conception of the "Four Freedoms," according to the German broadcaster Dr. Joseph Scharl.

Speaking to the domestic audience on the regular nightly "Review of the Situation" program, Dr. Scharl pointed out that the Lublin Committee and the Red Sections in Greece are receiving orders from Moscow, and stated that the inability of the Australians to co operate with this level point indicates the sacrifice of their original war aims.

Dr. Scharl said that the declaration by the Lublin Committee that it constitutes the Provisional Polish Government was inspired by Stalin, "who no longer has to consider the opinion of his Western Allies." He noted the similarity of the announcement that members of the Exile Government had been pronounced to the Provisional Government since they were not accepted responsibility for elections organized by the government in London, affirming that the purpose of this move is to that Anglo-American credits to the Poles and thus further secure Soviet domination over the country.

Referring to the Greek war, Dr. Scharl stated Churchill's failure to achieve an agreement served as further evidence that justice in fusing the Greek price. These two incidents, in addition to rising casualties, the realization that rebirth of German strength has weakened the war effort in the Far East, and the remaking of the Luftwaffe have aroused the American public, said Dr. Scharl. With these great threats and the heavy sacrifices of the war, the people in America went some reaf firmation of Allied war aims, he added, citing the recent request of a U. S.
Senator that the President set down the national objectives in the war (DHS 1235).

An enthusiastic talk describing the revival of all "the old signs of victory" in the Belgian peninsula area was offered to the home audience by Holz, Rhudell in a "Front Reports" broadcast. He credited the "skill of the German command" with taking the Americans completely by surprise in the recent counter-offensive, and stated that the ability to keep the forthcoming offensive a secret was due to the "excellent discipline of our troops."

Picturing his ride through the battle areas, Rhudell cited the view of "burned cent, destroyed villages, prisoners and singing German troops" as evidence of the revival of old victory days.

Contrasting the joyous German soldiers with the "tardy, shivering" American prisoners, he mentioned that the German troops were enjoying the contents of captured Christmas parcels. He claimed that the Americans had left behind large amounts of equipment, in addition to personal property (GHS 1950).

The reappearance in the German soldier of the "old traditional German military spirit" was hailed in an article in Der Bund. It stated that "indestructible internal power...and unbroken steadfastness" helped the troops to continue fighting against heavy odds, and that now that they have taken the offensive they are proving the success of their excellent soldiers training (DIB H11 1917).

An article in the Volkskischer Beobachter attempted to show that the achievements of Minister Speer in perfecting the modern production technique principle illustrated the capabilities of men whose roots are in the "people."

Praising Speer and his associates as main "of the people" who are succeeding in "giving expression" to the new German economy, the paper added: "The German war economy is a revolutionary development. The Americans must confess that statistics show the German war potential is higher than that of the United States" (DIB H11 1910).

Other items continued to highlight disparity between the Allies: as shown in the Polish question (GHS 1935); alleged British satisfaction with the arrest of American soldiers in Paris for "stealing cigarettes" (GHS 1230; GHS 0800); the American shortages of material and troops as expressed in the new program for the drafting of men for armament industry and the call-up of agricultural workers between 18 and 26 (DIB H11 1926; GOS 0866); and the reported bitterness of American prisoners against German "soldat officers" enjoying the war in rear areas (GOS 0866).

Eastern Front: DIB's Dr. Max Krull analyzed the situation in Hungary as a Soviet failure, asserting that "the plan to conduct along with the attack on Budepost another double attack on both sides of the Dnehu up the river" had been smashed (DIB H11 1913).

At the same time reports of the "unprecedented ferocity" and "increased violence" of the Budapest battle filled transmissions throughout the day. Transcean's Karl Pluchofer, claiming that battle for Budapest was becoming fiercer and fiercer, said that the German-Hungarian forces "have no rest either by day or by night."
Pluchofer described the roar of hundreds of Soviet planes over the city but continued to say that the Luftwaffe was attacking Soviet supply lines incessantly. All of the Budapest reports appeared either in broadasts to the forces or elsewhere.
None appeared in home audience programs (Transcean Morse 1322; GOS 0800, 1100, 1500; DIB H11 1230, 1232, 1230, 1202, 1240; German course).

The Slovenian border front came in for small mention, the commentator stating that heavy "defensive battles" against reinforced Soviet attacks between the Gen and the course of the Soja had taken place. One press transmission described the attack, which was said to be of regimental strength, as having penetrated into the wooden and mountainous border region of Slovenia. The Soviet advance offensive was claimed to have been brought to a halt (GOS 0800; DIB H11 1518, 1550; Trans-ccean Morse 1290; German course).

Central formations of General Jacob's "Army of Liberation" were reported to have inflicted considerable damage on the enemy (232st Infantry Division) in a battle north of the Drave River (DIB H11 2064).

Strong German air formations of the Luftwaffe were claimed to have hindered Soviet troops movements west of Budapest on 2 January in reports which supplemented similar activity on the western front (DIB H11 1268, 1416).

Italian Front: Fighting was reported to have flared up in many sectors of the Italian front, particularly north of Fiume, north of Brunico-Cavallina and northwest of Rover, British penetrations of the Via Adriatica, and German occupation of the west bank of the Soja were indicated (GOS 0866; DIB H11 1220; German course).
DNB's Dr. Max Krull devoted a brief moment to the Italian campaign to point out that this sector had been largely exhausted as a reserve source for other manoeuvres by the Allies, and that the entire front could hardly achieve any great importance in the future (DNB Hall 1915).

A report from Italian Headquarters gave out the information that there is an Italian Legion of volunteers and a battalion of Black Shirts fighting with the German forces on the island of Crete (DNB Hall 1458).

2. Southeastern Europe: The early morning overseas broadcast claimed that in an attempt to reconcile all factions in Greece, Archbishop Damaskinos was now trying to form a political government with General Plastiras as its head (GHS 0965). Transmissions throughout the day carried reports of continued heavy fighting in Athens, particularly in the Piraeus, where it was said, the British had gained some ground. However, it was added, that the EAM formations were in possession of northern Greece (GHS 1900; GHS 0700, 1230, 2200; 2400; DNB Hall 1138, 1546, 2087).

3. Political Front: Dissent among the three chief Allied powers was discussed at great length in transmissions to the European press as not being "Nazi propaganda." The Daily Mirror, the British newspaper most frequently quoted by German propagandists, was reported to have said, "Misunderstandings and differences of opinion between Washington, Whitehall and Moscow have become only more obvious during the last few weeks. The beginning of a new world war has been made, once the big powers stand on opposite sides in a struggle between smaller powers, or if a big power is pursuing a policy towards a small country which is not agreeable to the other big powers."

An article in Time and Tide from last December was pointed out with reference to the eastern and western fronts: "It is possible that the unexpectedly long-bad weather has forced the Soviet army to stop; but these conditions were no worse than in Holland . . . One cannot help thinking something has gone wrong" (DNB Hall 1622).

The coming meeting of Stalin with Churchill and Roosevelt was seen as a necessary outcome of Dissent. The Irish Times was inclined to have stated editorially that Stalin acted in Europe as though there were no Anglo-Russian alliance, and that the Soviet Union and Britain clashed with respect to European interests (DNB Hall 1558, 1828, 2138).

The Redier Nebrichtsen was said to have published a report that the Soviet Union had initiated a movement in Sofia to create a federation of the Danube and Balkan countries. The federation would have to be joined, it was said, by seven countries: Bulgaria, Hungary, Greece, Rumania, Austria, and Yugoslavia. This movement was seen as an inducement to Greece to get her out of the "British sphere of influence" (DNB Hall 1947).

4. Eastern Europe: Claiming that the "murder of the elite of the Polish officer corps at Katyn" had been the Soviet Union's provocation for the Lublin Committee to eventually declare Poland a Soviet Republic, a home audience broadcast stated that the Kremlin would follow these "extravagant methods" because it would encounter no opposition from London and Washington (GHS 2009).

A spokesman of the Wilhemstrasse was reported to have noted that the Lublin Committee has not been recognized officially as the Provisional Polish Government by Moscow, yet it regarded and treated as such by Soviet radio stations (DNB Hall 1947).

Wernersdorf broadcasted the dilemma of the U.S. in an article quoted from The New York Times which reportedly said that America "recognizes the creation of the Provisional Polish Government as a de facto event, but does not know how to withdraw its recognition of the London Poles and to acknowledge the Lublin Poles instead" (IPS 1600).

In the meantime, statements by the new Polish government were given considerable notice. Foremost among them were allusions to the government in exile, namely that the Lublin group would not be bound to any financial agreements made by the London Poles with foreign governments (IPS 1100; DNB Hall 1418; Transacson Morse 0649).

American comment on the new government was found in transmissions to the overseas press quoting John Brinkley, a New York public commentator as saying that Great Britain, the U.S., and many American Poles were of the opinion that members of the Lublin Committee were communists and not representatives of Poland. A New Year telegram to Roosevelt and Stettinius from American Poles was reported to have said that public opinion in America would never agree to a peace which did not establish Poland's complete freedom and independence. This telegram, it was added, was an attempt to influence the State Department which has not as yet recognized the Lublin
In the Pacific Front, American superfortress based in the Marianas were reported in European press transmissions to have bombed the area of Japan between Hiroshima and Osaka on Wednesday. "After 90 minutes," the report went on, "the Japanese air defense forced the enemy to depart." Incendiary bombs were said to have been dropped, and several B-29's destroyed (DNB Holl 1216, 1300).

The Japanese Navy Minister, Admiral Yonai, was reported to have said in a New Year message to his staff that ultimate victory depended upon the possibility of overcoming "the present difficult position." On the 2605th year of Japanese history, Yonai reportedly said, Japan is resolved to give its last for total final victory (DNB Holl 1216).

German propaganda continued to stress the fighting on Leyte, giving details of attempted American movements ("the 24th and 32nd divisions are trying to unite"), though General MacArthur had announced the campaign as victorious and terminated (DNB Holl 1210).
HEADQUARTERS TWELFTH ARMY GROUP

BROADCAST FROM EXAMINATIONS, TEAMS AND ANALYSIS

Covering Broadcasts from 0001 12 January to 0001 13 January
(Prepared by E.D. Detachment)

1. ALL BROADCASTS AREDB: As German forces were reported continuing their withdrawal from the Ardennes salient, DB commentator Dr. Max Krull pointed out that the penetration begun is still 25-kilometers wide and that the retiring troops here suffered extremely light losses because of the successful minefields they prepared. The German line was said to be established on the eastern bank of the Ourthe River, running from Vielsalm near St. Vith south to Longchamps, just above Bastogne.

The Allies were reported to have penetrated German positions southeast of Bastogne in new attacks, but on the northern flank of the German breakthrough area, German artillery fire was said to have stopped an Allied advance in its initial stages.

On the southern front, German forces retained the offensive, and it was claimed they corneredTickerwaller and Liershoven, encircled an Allied force at Stouhain and cleared the entire area between the Rhine and the River Ill.

In his weekly radio in Brussels, last night to the domestic audience, Dr. Goebbels asserted that the principal weakness of the Allies was their lack of a clear conception of political ends, whereas Germany's main strength lay in the willingness of the people to sacrifice for the achievement of their revolutionary national socialist ideals.

2. BROADCAST FROM EXAMINATIONS, TEAMS AND ANALYSIS

(a) German counter-attacks from the central sector of the Ardennes salient, the 12th Army commander Dr. Max Krull warned the Allies against premature jubilation based on a belief that the German threat had been successfully parried.

Dr. Krull emphasized that the Allies actually have only narrowed the penetration zone from a width of approximately 30 kilometers to 25, and while the German forces were able to withdraw "without losses" because the British troops followed their retreat through extensive minefields, the German line, which a week ago ran from Arlon to St. Robert, now reaches from Vielsalm (west of St. Vith) south to Longchamps (just north of Bastogne), on the eastern bank of the Ourthe River, according to Dr. Krull.

Explaining the withdrawal ostentatiously, Dr. Krull said: "It has shortened the German zone by more than half, and it released many troops to support the front of the German salient." He went on to contend that the "overall strategic position" remains the same and the enemy's forces are engaged in this sector, and a large-scale breakthrough attack is impossible at any other point along the western front (see 0240; see 2200).

New Allied attacks were reported against the southern flank of the Belgium-Luxembourg bulge, and it was acknowledged that the Allies had broken through German positions southeast of Bastogne.

The penetration was said to have been achieved by three divisions, part of a larger Allied force now concentrated along the southern part of the wedge. It was further said that the construction had been scaled off and that a counterattack had been launched by German forces.

On the northern flank, German artillery and mobiles were credited with checking Allied advances. It was stated that the artillery fire halted the forward movements "before they got underway".

In all 66 communique desertion action in the Ardennes sector, the intensity of the shelling and the "flares" or "flakengeschütze" fighting of the Allied forces was described. "Great reports" to the domestic audience said, "The fighting here is very hard, the enemy is tough, but harder than the enemy is the German soldier" (German counter BBC 1934, 2200; CBS 2200; CBS 2300).
The most unique presentation of a complete picture of fighting in the southern sector, which was repeated almost verbatim in all other transmissions. It read:

"In the Lower Vosges, Alpine forces are engaged in successful attacks near Donjonnier (a late broadcast claimed capture of this town). South of Weissenburg, tanks and infantry forces have broken into more strong points in the high line, and have penetrated into the depth of the fortification area. The strong point of Hilltop 266 was captured. Countertackles of local American reserves were successful.

"The enemy (Allies) did not continue their attacks against our bridgehead north of Strasbourg yesterday, because he had been weakened by his own losses. In the battle area of Central Alsace, enemy forces encircled at Oberhein were smashed. The number of prisoners has increased to more than 1,000. Army guns as well as light and heavy infantry weapons were captured. An attempt to relieve the second encircled enemy formation failed, and its resistance is now crumbling.

"German gains in the southern fighting, one broadcast said that the entire area between the Rhine and the River Ill is now in German hands (German troops: GES 2200; GES 2100; GES 2000).

"German tanks smashed the Allied counterattack west of the Vosges, in Algeria, Pushing toward the German line, the advance against the Allies was diagnosted by Dr. Goebbels in his speech as the lack of a clear conception of political aims. While in essence, Germany's strategy was attributed to the willingness of the German people to make all sacrifices for the achievement of revolutionary National Socialist ideals.

"Fighting out that the enemy is united only in its will to destroy the Reich and annihilate the German nation, Dr. Goebbels stated that beyond this single objective the Allies were split by political differences that cloud their war program and tend to lessen the force of their arms. "It is true that the enemy is united in what he wants to destroy and wipe out," said Dr. Goebbels, "but he is not united with respect to what he wants to replace the destroyed structures."

"A "normal" voice broke in repeatedly as the weekly Goebbels editorial was read over the Home Service, making such statements as: "The whole world laughs about that stupid statement, you don't believe it yourself...You're crazy. You have murdered for the last time...You want to bring the last man and woman to the grave...Stop lying, you make us sick."

"Symptoms of the divergent political conceptions of the Allies, Dr. Goebbels, said the conflicting viewpoints of the conservative elements represent in the Anglo-American plutocracy, as against the revolutionary forces of the Soviet Union. "These viewpoints will inevitably clash," he said, and the Anglo-American forces are now helping Bolshevik power to win another day find themselves forced to face it in battle.

"Today, would be more naïve than for the Anglo-American leaders to believe that they could prevent a decision except by the force of arms," declared Dr. Goebbels. "There is no way for them to escape the dilemma of war.

"Instilling the lack of political "independence" (world outlook) in the plutocracy, Dr. Goebbels asserted that the coming peace must cause a complete change of political opinion that will mark the end of the age of plutocracy. The decline of plutocracy was said to have been proven by a "Hitler Peace" in a German town, in which only five percent of the population supported the return of the Kaiser Republic. This proves that democratic ideas are genuine, he concluded, and the "new way of life started by National Socialism must be continued."

"While the Allies engage in quarrels as to the distribution of oil and coal an attempt to replace their "non-existent program with stupid phrases," the German people are driven by their revolutionary ideals to make every sacrifice to the attainment of their new life based on a great hope for a reconstructed Germany, claimed Dr. Goebbels (GES 1944).

"A recent trend toward strictly stoic inquirer received added emphasis in the middle "Review of the Situation" by Willfred von Oven, a large part of which was devoted to alleged misdeeds by American troops on the western front.

Three stories of American brutality were quoted to prove the point. One told of a German Red Cross worker beaten and murdered because he was transporting his old mother to a place of safety; another described a group of drunken Negro troops attempting to molest German children and eventually tossing a hand grenade in their midst, killing one of the children and wounding the others; and the third described a group of soldiers, led by a Jew, driving a woman and her old father toward the German lines as they fired at them from behind.

Citing these deeds together with Soviet brutalities in Ukrainian villages, von Oven affirmed that the instigators were the Jews, "thirsting for the blood of Europe and the extermination of residual mankind."

Von Oven pleaded with the German people not to suppose that the Anglo-American soldiers have humane feelings, pointing out that "they come from another world, where the Jewish rules and where the criminal is a hero and murder the deed of a coward."

The total war effort of the German people was attributed to the fanatical hatred of the Jews and the antipathy of the Germans to the American world. This hatred, said von Oven, is expressed in "our work, our fighting, and our unshakeable determination not to rest until our enemies realize that they will not break through the iron will of resistance of the entire German people" (GHS 1225).

The terror of the occupation forces was also seen expressed in a report from British-American headquarters that five German boys between 12 and 16 years old and a girl of 17 were arrested "solely because they had confirmed clearly that they were Germans" (GHS 2000; GHS 2000).

Another Frontline story told of a German medical corps sergeant taken prisoner while tending to German wounded, who was cursed and repulsed by his captors and who reportedly witnessed the murder of two other German soldiers who had been taken prisoner (GHS 1900).

The anti-Semitic line, which has cropped up more regularly the past few weeks in German propaganda, was further stressed in reports alleging that Jews who wore former members of Al Capone's gang were leaders of a gang of Paris forgers, posing in American uniforms; that the Jew Walter Lipmann advocated the distribution of the world between America, Britain, and Russia, and that President Roosevelt has agreed that no orthodox Jews would be Inducted in the Army (HFS 0900; GHS 0845).

One dispatch referring to an article written in the Baltimore Sun by "the Jew Lechner" discussed plans for the reeducation of Germany. It said: "Jews and Jew-followers are already writing histories of Germany and other textbooks in Stockholm, which are to be introduced into German schools on the entry of the Allies. It is obvious that every immigrant from Germany will be among those writing the books. Their work is officially supported by President Roosevelt. It is obvious that this is part of the Allied policy of annihilating the Aryan. The German will see to it that these forged histories and textbooks will never fall into the hands of German school children" (GHS 0900).

For the second consecutive day dispatches asserted that Allied shipping arrangements prepared four months ago were not working out now in view of the German counteroffensive. It was claimed that too much space has been allowed for the Pacific theatre, which requires 200,000 tons to transport a division from the states to the Pacific in four to five months, compared to 50,000 tons for similar division to Europe in two weeks. The planning error also had prevented the rearming of the French army, according to the reports (Transoceanic Horse 0635; GHS 2200).

A Transoceanic item from Berlin stated that the population of Berlin has been forbidden to burn any electric stoves at home or in offices. It added that in some German towns there is no gas burning, during certain hours of the day (Transoceanic Horse 1221).

1. Eastern Front: Late evening broadcasts mentioned the "increased violence" of the fighting in the Vielsack bridgehead near Berlin, but did not acknowledge the announcement by a US military reporter that the Russians had started a new offensive "on a broad front" in southeastern Poland, 20 miles south of Warsaw (GHS 2200; GHS 2200; GHS 2200; GHS 2200; GHS 2200).

The front was told that in the area north of Stahlweissenburg, west of the Vistula River, and west of the Oder basin, German forces were gaining ground, while the communiqués merely mentioned that Russian attacks in these sectors had been repelled (GHS 2200; GHS 2200; GHS 2200; GHS 2200; GHS 2200). The area north of the Donau was described as the scene of "heavy fighting with unabated ferocity" particularly in what one report called the "Konev-Brondzovu-est-rog triangle." The Soviets, it was claimed, had attacked "out of their six-mile long bridgehead on the area, but were repelled." At the same time, however, another broadcast claimed that in this area north of the Danube, the Germans were on the offensive (GES 2220; GES 2230; DNB Hall 1108).

A broadcast in the European service claimed that the Russians had suspended all operations in the Slovakian border area, including the region around Kosice. This was interpreted as meaning that the Russians intended these troops for the fighting north and south of the Danube (GES 2230).

In Budapest, the fighting was said to have reached the inner districts of the city, partially because the Russians had used paratroopers in their operations, it was reported. Most of the fighting was placed in the vicinity of the Ostbahnhof (eastern railway station), which, a later broadcast added, had been cleared of all German troops (DUB Hall 1145; GES 0800; 2100; GES 0850; German Corusc).

Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, seemingly aware of the Russian armies approaching Austria, was reported to have published an article entitled "Vienna and the Hungarian Battle" which, it was said, contained the present threat to that city with that of the Turkish Wars. "The attitude of the Viennese is like that in all other towns and villages hit by terror attacks...The people everywhere in terrorized Germany have become harder" (DUB Hall 1013).

c. Italian Front: Two reports were received on the fighting in Italy, both identical and revealing little action:

"In central Italy, only reconnaissance activity by both sides has been reported. During mop-up actions, behind the front, 2,500 bandits were captured" (GES 2100; German Corusc).

d. Political Front: Two German newspaper articles were quoted in a European press transmission as comment on a statement appearing in the Soviet publication, War and the Banking Classes, which was purported to be that a return of the liberated countries to the governmental forms of the pre-war period was impossible.

Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung was said to have written that this statement indicated that Moscow's interpretation of the Atlantic Charter was now clearly seen, and the result would be a decisive turn in events.

Zweigl der Blatt interpreted the statement, it was said, as revealing what was understood by the Kremlin by the term "democratic Europe"—what had not already been observed by the "fate of the Soviet ruled nations: Lublin-Poland, "Bosnia-Croatia, Finland and Lithuania." Thus, it was asserted, in the term "democracy" Moscow found a camouflage for its "Bolshevist revolutionary plans." The article then concluded: "According to that, democracy is everything that is Bolshevistic, while everything else is denounced as Fascist" (DUB Hall 1087).

An article from Izvestia, reportedly transmitted by the Associated Press, was quoted as indicative of "France's increasing bitterness over the neutrality of Switzerland. Switzerland's attitude, the Soviet official organ was reported to have said, "can hardly be tolerated much longer" (GES Hall 1126).

Pointing up the fact that E.Suisse had as yet not been invited to the tripartite conference, German propaganda continued to dwell on the alleged "French campaign to have Dubrovnik participate." The newspaper owned by the French Foreign Minister, Diction, was reported to have said: "If France's cooperation is necessary for terminating the war, then her participation in diplomatic discussions is all the more necessary for preparing the peace" (Transaddon Morse 0645).

e. Western Europe: Several transmissions concerned themselves with descriptions of the "hunger and misery" in France and Belgium. An unnamed Swiss newspaper was reported to have written: "Wherever the democratic powers have set foot in Europe, there is hunger and chaos. The illusory democracy shows itself, the more national socialism will be vindicated" (GES Hall 1097; GES 0800, DNB 1108).

The French collaborativist, Jacques Darlot, reported to be the president of the German-formed French Liberation Committee, was alleged to have said: "France has never been so unhappy as she is under Anglo-American occupation...There is no future for France unless the curse of Judaism, Freemasonry and Bolshevism are cut out of the body politic" (GES 1400).

f. Eastern Europe: A Stockholm dispatch which quoted Radio New York said that the Lublin Government had already started to partitio:n large Polish estates in liberated Poland. The report also said that the Lublin group had similar plans for East Prussia, Pommerell and Silesia (DNB Hall 1102). "In Lublin Poland," another dispatch said, "the land has already been nationalized, peasants have received no compensation, and riots are reported from all parts of the country" (GES 0800).

German Corusc.
"Review of the Situation" by Wilfred von Oven. A large part of which was devoted to alleged misconduct by American troops on the western front.

Three stories of American brutality were quoted to prove the point. One told of a German Red Cross worker tortured and murdered because he was transporting his old mother to a place of safety; another described a group of drunken Negro troops attempting to molest German children and eventually tossing a hand grenade in their midst, killing one of the children and wounding the others; and the third described a group of soldiers, led by a Jew, driving a woman and her old father toward the German lines as they fired at them from behind.

Giving these deeds together with Soviet brutality in Hungarian villages, von Oven affirmed that the instigators were the Jews, "thirsting for the blood of Europe and the extermination of occidental penning.

Von Oven pleaded with the German people not to suppose that the Anglo-American soldiers have human feelings, pointing out that "they come from another world, where the Jew rules and where the criminal is a hero and murder the dead of alevator.

The total war effort of the German people was attributed to the fanatical hatred of the Jew and the antipathy of the Germans to the American world. This hatred, said von Oven, is expressed in "our work, our fighting, and our unshakeable determination to rest until our enemies realize that they will not break through the iron will of resistance of the entire German people" (GHS 1235).

The terror of the occupation forces was also expressed in a report from British-American headquarters that five German boys between 12 and 15 years old and a girl of 17 were arrested "merely because they had confirmed clearly that they were Germans" (GHS 2000, 2200).

Another front-line story told of a German medical corps sergeant taken prisoner while tending to German wounded, who was cursed and abused by his captors and who reportedly witnessed the murder of two other German soldiers who had been taken prisoner (GHS 1900).

The semi-satirical line, which has cropped up more regularly the past few weeks in German propaganda, was further stressed in reports alleging that Jews who were former members of Al Capone's gang were leaders of a gang of Paris forgers, posing in American uniforms; that the Jew Walter Lippermann advocates the distribution of the world between America, Britain and Russia; and that President Roosevelt has agreed that no orthodox Jews would be issued in the Army (GHS 1900; GHS 1036).

One dispatch referring to an article written in the Baltimore Sun by "the Jew Lochner" discussed plans for the evacuation of Germany. It said: "Jews and Jew-followers are already writing histories of Germany and other textbooks in Stockholm, which are to be introduced into German schools on the entry of the Allies. It is obvious that many immigrants from Germany will be among those writing the books. Their work is officially supported by President Roosevelt. It is obvious that this is part of the Allied policy of annihilating the Jews. The Allies will see to it that these forged histories and textbooks will never fall into the hands of German school children" (GHS 1235).

For the second consecutive day dispatches asserted that Allied shipping arrangements had been prepared four months ago were not working cut now in view of the German counteroffensive. It was claimed that too much snare has been allotted for the Pacific theatre, which requires 200,000 tons to transport a division from the states to the Pacific in four to five months, compared to 50,000 tons for similar division to Europe in two weeks. The planning error also had prevented the strengthening of the French army, according to the reports (Transoceanic Horse 9933; GHS 2200).

A Transoceanic item from Berlin stated that the population of Berlin has been forbidden to burn any electric stoves at home or in offices. It added that in some German towns there is no gas burning during certain hours of the day (Transoceanic Horse 121).

Eastern Front: Late evening broadcasts mentioned the "increased violence" of the fighting in the Vistula bridgehead near Brestov, but did not acknowledge the communiques by a BBC military reporter that the Russians had started a new offensive "on a broad front" in southeastern Poland, 20 miles south of Warsaw (GHS 2200; GHS 2200; BBC Roll 1227).

The home front was told that in the areas north of Stalhweissamine, west of the Vistula Mountains, and west of the Carpathian Mountains, German forces were gaining ground, while the communiques hardly mentioned that Russian streets in these sectors had been requisitioned (GHS 2200; GHS 2200; German source).
The German occupation of the Ukraine has left deep marks, according to the London Daily Times. The newspaper was quoted as saying that National Socialist ideology had not been forgotten by the people of the Ukraine and Moscow would have to reckon with it (GHS 1900).

The Minister of Traffic for the London Poles was reported to have accused the British of doing nothing for the population of eastern Poland, and the Soviets of forbidding relief work for them (GHS 1230).

b. Southeastern Europe: The declaration of a truce between General Sosice and the HM on Thursday evening found mention in several transmissions, but, one report added, "the conference repeatedly broke up on the question of releasing hostages." No other terms of the truce were given. One broadcast to the home front emphasized that the truce was only tentative, adding the alleged statement by an "Hon. Member": We only need more time and more new weapons, and then we shall see whether our British friends will settle here for long" (GHS 0900, 1900, 1900; GFS 2200; RAB Bull 1659).

King Peter II, it was said, had two objections to the agreement reached between the Yugoslav exile Government's Prime Minister, Subac, and the Jugoslav Liberation Front's President, Tito. The objections centered around the formation of a regency, and around the stipulation that the Anti-Fascist Council of National Liberation would act as the legislative body until the National Assembly had been formed. The latter would place power in the hands of one single group, Peter was quoted as saying. According to Pemberton, the transmission concluded, the final decision might be postposed until after the Roosevelt-Churchill-Stalin meeting, although an earlier decision by the Three Powers would override Peter (Transocean News 068, 0827).

A broadcast to the home audience, stressing the "authoritarian manner of Churchill," reported that the British Government had denied all press conferences that Peter intended to hold. "The British insist on a regency under the command of the rubber chieftain Tito," it was explained (GHS 0900).

c. Pacific Front: The Japanese communiqué provided the substance for enemy propagandaists on all succeeding programs. For the first time losses reported to have been sustained by Allied naval forces were encircled, as follows: 1 aircraft carrier, 5 cruisers, 2 destroyers and 3 transports sunk. In addition, 1 aircraft carrier, 3 battleships, 2 cruisers and 7 transports were reported damaged. These losses were said to have been inflicted on 8 and 10 January by Japanese aircraft in which the Formosa Force took active part.

In all enemy reports from Tokyo after the communiqué, listeners were informed that one released American and two infantry divisions had been landed on the Luzon beaches against continued attacks from the Japanese ground and air forces under the leadership of General Yamashita (GHS Bull 1006; GHS 1400, 1900; GFS 2200; GZ 3300).

In the programs just before the Japanese communiqué was received Iveron stations were playing the declaration of the President of National China in Hankow, in which he said that China's successes this year had been extraordinary and that China's reconstruction was making good progress. He also was reported to have declared that China had renounced extra-territorial rights and attained full sovereignty (GFS 0900).

Covering Broadcasts from 0001 18 January to 0001 19 January

(Prepared by P & PW Detachment)

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: German formations were reported continuing to withdraw from the Ardennes salient, but fierce delaying actions were still being fought to prevent the Americans from taking the key towns of Houffalize and St. Vith.

British attacks southeast of Næsbyck were said to have developed into lively battles as the British Second Army attempted to crush the German Roer River bridgehead. In the Lissee sector, six to eight divisions of the American Seventh Army were believed concentrated south of Bitsch and at the northern edge of the Hagenau Forest.

Dr. Goebbels announced that the First and Ninth Armies had again reverted to the command of Lt. Gen. Bradley.

Dr. Goebbels, presumably unable to develop any encouraging themes with respect to the Soviet offensive, devoted his weekly editorial in Das Reich to the oft-repeated line that the Jews are guilty of the world's misery. He said that because the Jews wished revenge against Germany they had brought the Allies into the war, but promised that at the end of the war they would be annihilated throughout the world.

a. Western Front: While German formations continued to withdraw from the Ardennes penetration area, fierce delaying actions were being fought that prevented American units from taking the bitterly contested towns of Houffalize and St. Vith, according to yesterday's transmissions.

Transocean commentators Ludwig Sertorius and Walter Plate agreed that the German troops were disengaging themselves from the apex of the salient and had withdrawn to positions east of the Salz Valley. Pressure of the American troops was said to be particularly great south of Malmedy and east of Bastogne, and it was claimed that American attacks were shattered with heavy losses at Foyenxville and east of Salchatten. The American Third Army, attacking from the southeast in northern Luxemborg, was reported unable to cross the Wiltz-Diekirch line (Transocean Morse 1710, 1830).

North of the Ardennes wedge, the local attacks conducted by the British Second Army for the past few days were said to have developed into lively battles, as the British attempted to crush the German bridgehead across the Roer estuary. The attacks were carried out by three divisions against German positions southeast of Næsbyck, and the British penetrated into the town of Bützern (189115; Transocean Morse 1856; GermanCampo).

The increase of American pressure against the Orscholz Block between the Moselle and Saar Rivers east of Remich was said by Sertorius as the "tremorunner of a greater attempt to push from there into the deep southern flank of the German penetration area."

In the Alsen sector, Lt. Gen. Patch was said to have concentrated six to eight divisions of the Seventh Army in front of the two German penetration areas south of Bitsch and at the northern edge of the Hagenau Forest. Those divisions, said Transocean's Antheur Weber, were advancing uninterrupted against the German lines, but were unable to break through. The repeated attacks were costly for the Americans, costing them 30 to 50 percent of their tanks and 10 to 70 percent of their infantry (Transocean Morse 1252).

The fighting in the south was concentrated between Bitscheule and Ochsenburg, as the Americans reportedly attempted to seize the Haguenau Fortifications at Kistlerloch and Matten. The force which penetrated into Roipertswiller south of Bitsch was claimed to have been encircled and wiped out in a German counterattack.
Total losses of the American forces in France since 1 January were placed at 20,000 men, (German 136, Transocean Morse 1226; DNB Hall 1816, 1615; CB 2210).

DNB announced that it had been reported from Paris that the First and Ninth American armies had again reverted to the 13th Army Group, under command of Lt. Gen. Bradley (DNB Hall 1147).

In his dispatch, Warburd boasted that the German soldiers, particularly those who had been on the eastern front, were "hardest" than the American infantrymen, who when captured, "were so tired that they immediately fell into death-like sleep." The weakness of the American infantry was further proved, he said, by the recent employment of tank crews in infantry battles when their tanks were immobilized by the heavy winter snows (Transocean Morse 1218).

A story describing how an American soldier had shot a woman and her seven-year-old daughter because they "attempts to find small bits of coal in the scrap heap" was quoted as another example of Anglo-American mistreatment of civilians in occupied areas of Germany (GB 2009; DNB Hall 1655).

In the war, German U-boats were credited with the sinking of nine ships totaling 64,000 tons, transporting supplies from England to France (DNB Hall 1115; German 1962). American bombers were said to have struck the residential districts of Paderborn, while British night raiders attacked western and central Germany (German 1968; DNB Hall 1647).

b. German Home Front: Apparently unable to write an encouraging word concerning the week-old Soviet winter offensive, Dr. Goebbels devoted his entire editorial in Das Reich to further development of the age-old theme that the Jews are guilty of the world's misery and as punishment will be annihilated at the end of the war.

Describing the international danger of Jewry, Dr. Goebbels pointed out that it served as the link between Bolshevism and capitalism, "the cement which binds the enemy coalition despite great ideological differences." The motive of the Jews was to turn the war in their favor so that they will gain total rule over the peoples of the world.

Dr. Goebbels attempted to show how the Allied powers were being tricked by the Jews. "While Allied soldiers bleed and starve at the front, the Jews are taking their money on the stock markets and in the black market," he declared. "Every Russian, British and American soldier is a mercenary of this world conspiracy of a parasite race."

While in Russia anti-Semitism is punishable by death and in Britain and America it leads to social ostracism, the German nation has succeeded in its aim of being the first state in the world entirely free of Jews, asserted Dr. Goebbels. To evacuate their extermination in Germany, the Jews had led the Anglo-Americans and Russians to the "fire and sacrifice" of war. "In their newspapers and radio broadcasts they are singing war songs while the nations deceived by them are being led to the slaughter house."

"Their name is Morgenthau and Lohen, and they stand as the so-called braintrust behind Roosevelt," said Dr. Goebbels. "Their name is Kalshoff and Sassen and they serve as financiers and teachers for Churchill. Or their name is Kogonitch and Drasow and they are pathfinders and spiritual leaders of Stalin."

Predicting that the hour will come when the world will awaken and the Jews will be the victors, Dr. Goebbels said the German people watch with calmness the wild and furious outbursts of hatred and revenge by Jews all over the world. But the revolution against Jews had started in Germany, where the Judeo-society is the main backbone of the political and economic balance, and soon all the nations will see that the Jewish menace is the cause of the world's misfortune (DNB Hall 1969; Transocean Morse 1227)."

In other transmissions, the seriousness of the situation on the eastern front was emphasized. The Allgemeine Zeitung was quoted in a report to the European press as stating that the Soviet Union had to obtain a decision by destroying the German armies and opening the way into the Reich through Silesia (DNB Hall 1631).

An NSKK (tank corps) correspondent told of the counter-measures being taken by Volksturms, composed of men above 60 and youths of 16 and 17. Despite the bitter cold, they were said to have moved bravely into their positions to stem the Soviet spearheads "advancing up to the Reich border."

"They are defending their homeland against the first attack on their boundary," the correspondent wrote. "For those men there is no wavering" (DNB Hall 1214).

Dr. Edwards, in the midday "Review of the Situation," berated the Allies for exaggerating events on the eastern front and for predicting the early end of the war. He suggested that the Anglo-Americans might recall that on the same battlefields in 1914-1916 German courage and pluckary withstood an equally colossal Russian steamroller and brought the offensive to a halt."
Claiming that the Allies were attempting to hide their own difficulties behind the Soviet successes, he mentioned Roosevelt’s demand for compulsory national service and the admissions by De Gaulle that the “liberation” had brought misery and famine to France. Cold, hunger, look of fuel follow the Allied armies everywhere, Edwards stated.

The outcome would be the same for Germany if the enemy broke in from the east or west. It would mean complete disintegration of national life and the national element, and therefore the entire German nation stands absolutely against the enemy’s will for destruction (GHS 1945).

In another appeal for clothing for the “People’s Sacrifice” Collection, Reich Commissioner Hans Jacob said that “people should not give merely their surplus clothes, but should give until it hurts. It is estimated that everyone ought to give at least five percent of all his clothes.”

The collection was said to be necessary because of the reduction of the textile industry in favor of other war needs. But clothing was still needed for military, police and other units. "Everyone must give to the limit of his capacity. Total war requires total sacrifices" (GHS 1945).

c. Eastern Front: Admitting that the situation in the east was tense and "still in its beginning," Dr. Max Krull gave a lengthy analysis of the fighting in Poland and East Prussia, at the same time stating that a more complete review could only be given in a few days. Asserting that the German High Command had not yet mastered all its strength, Krull drew the following conclusions:

The Soviets will reap their harvest of the initial successes of their powerful military pressure exerted in the Vistula area; a second new propelling and reshuffling of Soviet units has to follow this expenditure of energy, during which the German counter-measures will take their full effect.

The “liquidation” slogan – March to Berlin – Krull interpreted as a propagandistic measure serving only political needs, with little strategic importance. He then drew a picture of the primary and secondary German defense zones which he placed as follows:

A temporary German stopping line marked by the towns of Gostow, Czestochowa, Lodi and Tomeshew. Behind this line, not one but several prepared German defense belts, which can only be crossed by the German and make a resistance possible for months, even with a change of strength.

Krull also found other reasons for a clearing up of the Russian driving lengthened supply line, which he said had already been cut, and would be more noticeable as the distances increased; mirages of victory, as in East Prussia, as a result of the defense approaching the border of the Reich.

Gostow is being extended from the north and northwest; from there the line goes west of Gostow, and proved strong enough to stop the Soviet spearheads. The fact that Czestochowa and Tomeshew were given up indicated to Krull the “liquid state” that the situation was still in. The evacuation of Warsaw was not interpreted by Krull as a Soviet tactical success, but as a necessitated by the Soviets bypassing the city from the north and south (DHB Bull 1947).

As evening transmissions mentioned for the first time that the “Soviet flood” had been allowed down by German forces, a clearer picture of the situation on the fighting in Poland was seen. The focal point of the battle was placed in the area north of the Vistula bend, where the Soviets were said to be attacking south, west, and northwest. The evacuation of Warsaw was claimed to have taken the Soviets by surprise, and to have had operational results. Soviet tanks were reported near Sokolow, while the bulk of the German garrison escaped encirclement, although rear guards are still fighting, it was said.

The second focal point of the battle was held to be at Trzechohow, a Soviet bridgehead across the Vistula south of Ostrowin was admitted. Further south, German reports agreed on the evacuation of Tomeshew and Czestochowa, and gave detailed descriptions of the inspections of their withdrawal. The entire 600 mile front was said to be extend from Homel to the Carpathians, the Soviets employing 130 divisions and 25 tank brigades. In the first five days of the Soviet offensive, they have lost 900 tanks, according to several German reports (DHB Bull 1140, 1103, 1118, 1426, 1930, 1935; Transocean Horse 228, 226, 1630; GHS 1230, 2200; GOS 0845; German camp)).

Rumors in East Prussia were claimed to be developing, with the German soldier facing an enemy enjoying a ten-to-one superiority (GHS 1230).

Soviet attacks in all sectors of the Hungarian front were reported to have failed. Few details were given. It was conceded, however, that the situation in Budapest "has become more difficult" (DHB Bull 1309, 1310, 1311, 2322; GOS 0845; Transocean Horse 1310; German camp).
d. Italian Front: Reports from the Italian theatre spoke of increased activity. The communiqué mentioned local attacks by the British Eighth Army in the region between the Etna Mountains and Lake Comacchio, while a DNB release described the "considerable amount of reconnaissance activity" south of Bologna and north of Florence. This was interpreted as indicating that the British intended to perform larger operations soon (DNB 2713; German bunch).

The Italian press Conservatori Romani was quoted as having complained about the "moral disintegration" of Italian youth, particularly in those sections of Allied occupied Italy where famines and unemployment prevail. Several other transmissions carried the same report with elaboration (DNB 0700, 1700).

In Sicily, especially against the Communists, found mention several times, the province of Reggio being reported as the scene of the killing of 15 civilians, 16 soldiers (DNB 1700; DNB 3140). The Italian Republican Headquarters was quoted as saying that all trade unions were to be dissolved immediately, to be replaced by the Italian Workers' Confederations (DNB 1230).

e. Political Front: Indicating that the Soviet Union could have no need for any supplies which might be shipped from the U.S. and Great Britain, and also that the western Allies did not wish to strengthen the Russians any more than at present, Berlin concluded that the opening of the Dardanelles for Allied shipping to Russia was the result of political coercion and done for political reasons, and therefore an infringement upon Turkey's independence. "Turkey now has the same relationship to the Dardanelles as Panama has to the Panama Canal or Egypt to the Suez Canal." Thus, Berlin said, years of foreign policy resulting in the successful Convention of Montreux had been in vain (DNB 2200; DNB 1404, 1755; Transocean Horse 1620).

The American ambassador to Turkey, Steinhardt, was given attention as regarded his "extremely remarkable declining career" on the occasion of the appointment of the new ambassador, Edwin Wilson. Steinhardt's new position, ambassador to the London Czechoslovakian Government, was seen as "extremely insignificant." The reason was given by Berlin that the State Department was not satisfied with Steinhardt's work in Turkey, since the U.S. intended to engage in political deals with the Soviet Union and Great Britain over Turkey, which had become the "object of imperialistic ambitions" of all three nations (DNB 1359, 1455).

Quotations without comment from Prime Minister Churchill's speech before the House of Commons were given throughout the afternoon (DNB 1500, 1525, 1534, 1600, 1638; Transocean Horse 1640, 1645, 1647, 1658).

f. Western Europe: Do Guille and Patilier were both reported by German sources to have complained of the "misery" prevailing in their respective countries. The city of Lyon was singled out as one of "hungry, cold, and darkness." The popular German theme of an "Allied transportation shortage" was found to be the reason, in one report (DNB 0700, 0900, 1230, 2000).

The Bishop of Montauban, reportedly protesting against "the anti-clerical policy of the French authorities," was credited with the statement that during the German occupation, the Catholic Church and its servants "were never harmed" (DNB 1715).

g. Southeastern Europe: The United Press was quoted as reporting that Plastira had appointed General Kontri, "a most ferocious enemy of ELAS," as governor-general of Macedonia and Thrace, and given him the task of forcing the ELAS to evacuate Salonika (DNB 2000, 2200; DNB 1335).

The Greek army is to be reorganized according to the British Army, it was reported, and already 30 battalions of the national guard have been created (DNB 1150).

The "Kito Radio" was alleged to report in every broadcast about "demonstrations against King Peter" in partisan-occupied territory. The radio announced the continuation of the war against the enemies of the people, "the last Peter at their head" (DNB 1900). At the same time, it was said that King Peter had "reached his objections to a recovery," according to a German commentator who added that Peter had been told that any other plan would be objected to by Kito (DNB 1335).

An increase of disputes between the Bulgarian Communists and the other parties of Bulgaria comprising the so-called "Fatherland Front" was reported from Vienna. A crisis was said to be expected shortly following the appointment of the Comintern chief Dimitrov as Prime Minister, rather than Curia (DNB 21000).

Commenting on the English report that Hone would go to the Serbo-Ukrainian because he expected a development similar to the Polish-Lublin situation, Berlin said, it was doubtful whether Hone would be able to travel there because of the possible intervention "of a certain big power," namely the Soviet Union, which might not want

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Anglo-American forces on the western front were said to have failed to regain the initiative after five weeks of countermobbing in the Ardennes salient, and as a result, were declared unable to fulfill their role in the master Allied plan—a mass offensive in the west to synchronize with the gigantic Russian drive in the east.

Fighting activity in the west was concentrated in the Vosges, where the First French Army launched an attack near Mulhouse. In the Lower Vosges to the north, part of the isolated American formations at Reipertswiller were said to have surrendered.

An editorial in the German press criticized Allied world security plans, stating that they would destroy any possibility of neutrality and would drag every nation in the world into any future war.

Western Front: After five weeks of determined countermobbing, the Anglo-Americans have failed to regain the initiative on the western front or to cut off the German Ardennes salient, according to DIB reports to the domestic press. As a result, it has become impossible for Eisenhower to carry out his part of Allied plans, a mass offensive in the west synchronized with the Soviet drive in the east.

The dispatches again emphasized that the western front has been pushed into the background by momentous events in the east, but stated that its principal importance lay in the relentless Allied attempts to eliminate the German penetration, restore the frontline situation that existed on 16 December and then launch the planned offensive against Western Germany. "But the only thing which the Allies were able to achieve after long weeks of hard fighting and high losses was a stop by stop advance of positions in the part of the salient farthest to the west of the penetration area," said one report.

It was shown that the Allied countermobbing have moved from the Sauer River area and Mulhouse to Bastogne and Stavelot and from there to Lorraine and Northern Alsace, the latter change as a result of German pressure. The constant shifts in the focal point of the action were seen as proof that the Allies have "still not realized their freedom of movement" (DIB Bull 1450, 1454).

Operative reports stressed the fighting on the southern wing of the western front, particularly the new events by the two to four divisions of the First French Army. After a two-hour artillery barrages, the French were said to have attacked in a northerly direction between the Upper Vosges and Mulhouse. Penetrations north of Lorraine and west of Mulhouse were claimed scaled off (END Bull 1165; Transcom 1837; German reports).

The French were also credited with conducting relief attacks against the growing German pressure north of Strasbourg, but it was said the attacks were repulsed and the French forced to retreat as German troops advanced west of Horlisheim.

Northeast of Reipertswiller in the Lower Vosges, the Allies were reported to have made repeated attacks to relieve troops fighting in the salient. These attempts collapsed, and part of the isolated formations surrendered on Sunday morning. The number of prisoners taken was placed at 365, including several officers, and it was estimated there were 1,000 dead in the pocket.

In the Mittelstrassen-Latten area, new Allied attacks also were reported against pillbox positions in the Maginot Line. It was claimed the Allies did not succeed in capturing any of the pillboxes (END Bull 1112, 1136; Gls 2300; German reports; Transcom Bull 1617).

Reports were limited concerning fighting in the northern sector. Fierce skirmishes took place south of Nancy, where the British are driving against the German Rear bridgehead north of Sittard, while further south, in the Oostrum area, the Allies were said to have retreated under German pressure. In the Ardennes salient, a new Allied attempt to break through between Malmedy and Diekirch was claimed to have been frustrated (DNB 1134, 1139, German enemy GHS 2200).

 Anglo-American bombers attacked western, southwestern and southern Germany, inflicting severe damage to residential areas in Nimeguen and Leiden. German anti-aircraft was credited with shooting down 53 planes (German enemy GHS 2200).

 A dispatch from the British Home Service reported a special dispatch from war correspondent Frank Furniss. He cited the experiences of a sergeant Long, who had been taken by the Americans along with several comrades, and then released. Long reportedly told how he was kicked and blasted repeatedly by his captors; how American troops threw rocks at him; how he was locked in a room and forced to hold his head down for two hours; and how he and his comrades were refused permission to go to the lavatory (DNB 1140).

 German Home Front: Allied world security plans were assailed in the D najbliższie anti-anti World League on "imaginary initiatives of the old League of Nations," which would destroy any conception of neutrality or national self-determination and would make every future war universal in scope.

 The newspaper's editorial, quoted at length by the BIB Home Service, pointed out that the security plan would develop into a stepping-stone for world Polish plan. The current Soviet offensive was characterized as a move to prejudice Russia's share in Allied security policies, and it was asserted that Stalin's ready was decided the Red Army bear the main share in the proposed international police force.

 The anti-Sovietist theme received further emphasis in another BIB report on Germany. Making his case from a statement of miserable conditions in Europe apposing the Catholic Church, the dispatch affirmed that the "battle" is now being waged between the Bolsheviks and the defenders of the existing social order. Moscow was seen in one European government after another, inviting the "liberated" countries to revolt, supporting revolutionaries openly or secretly, while Britain denounces the trend by "pretending" that the communist minority in the countries is the mouthpiece of the entire nation (DNB 1140).

 The disintegration of British military morale was pictured in an alleged statement from a captured British officer, who acknowledged that "the British soldier has no ideals for which he is fighting." He spoke of the inevitability of another war in 10 to 20 years, voiced his opposition to the Parliamentary system of government and doubted the effect of socialist plans in England; criticized treatment of the British "bomb-duds," claimed high finance is responsible for the war and is making large profits from it; and distrusted British news reports (DNB 1137, 1140; GHS 2200).

 In connexion with the Soviet winter offensive, domestic broadcasts quoted Allied new reports telling of fierce German resistance and numerous German casualties. The Berlin press again stressed the important effect of the Ardennes counteroffensive in preventing "synchronized enemy attacks from the west and south." The principal factors of German offense on the eastern front were described as follows:

 1. The depth in which the divisions are deployed, which provides a stubborn defense and enables German infantry to "fight back step by step."
 2. The speed of advance, though against the most advanced Soviet spearheads.
 3. The reserves, "whose march is the front and active participation in the war required same time." (DNB 1138; GHS 2200).

 According to a further dispatch, with reports of hundreds of bombs falling on London, the terrifying state of the population which spends all its time studying the skies for new robots or rockets (GHS 0700, 1100; DNB 1139, 1140).

 An early broadcast to the home audience mentioned the destruction of 600 Cane troops just before they were scheduled for shipment to the European theatre (GHS 1100).

 In what seemed to be an appeal for more destructive scientific discoveries, Guggenhein School told German intellectuals that the war will be decided on the basis of science, and declared that all the most important inventions of the war had been made by German scientists and placed at the disposal of the government "for a German victory" (GHS 0700).

 The need for kraftwaffe replacements could be seen in this special commentary over the domestic radio: "The General responsible for the roll-up of young men to the kraftwaffe announced that all men of the 1937 class who are to be officer candidates and who have so far not received their orders, will report immediately in Berlin (GHS 2000).

The excellent results of the first large-scale collection for the People's Sacrifice (Volkskope) campaign were cited in an evening broadcast. The willingness of the people to sacrifice, even in a terror-stricken time, was shown in several examples. One told of a mother, who "brought the last uniform of her son who had been killed at the front, and with tears in her eyes entered her name into the book of honor of the German people" (GHS 1400, 2600, 2200).

6. Eastern Front: A new Soviet offensive by General Chernyshov into East Prussia, beginning west of Jawliski and headed for the Musurian Lakes was announced by the overseas press service last night (Transsecon Horse 2106).

Last transmissions emphasized that German resistance was stiffening but admitted that Soviet pressure was strongest in the upper Silesian industrial region, between the Warthe and the Vistula, and in the southern part of East Prussia. Participation by the People's Grandiédor and the Volksturm in the Silesian sector was played up in home audience broadcasts. The majority of transmissions admitted the Soviet advances between the Warthe and Vistula westward, Soviet penetrations into the towns of Gummién and Tilsit were admitted, and a heavy battle "waging to and fro" was reported to be taking place between Insterburg and Breslau. The drive from the southern sector of East Prussia was said to have been reinforced, and to be progressing northward. No further Soviet gains or setbacks were mentioned, and reports throughout the day merely mentioned the southerian fronts that were encompassed by the Soviet offensive as the scenes of fierce fighting. Transsecon's Karl Fischler, in a short report pointed out that in the light of the ever-changing situation, the names of localities could not be given (DIB Holl 1056, 1202, 1302, 2005; Transsecon Horse 1211, 1786; GHS 2200; German communique).

German forces in Budapest were reported to have repelled "successfully" all attacks by the Soviets. German tank formations were said to be advancing west of Budapest between Lake Velence and the Danube on a 25 mile front. In four weeks of fighting in Hungary, it was announced, the Soviets had lost 1500 tanks, 255 planes, and over 100,000 men. On the Slovakian-Hungarian border, the fighting was claimed to have diminished in activity (DIB Holl 1056, 2005; GHS 0805; German communique).

The Red Army newspaper, Red Star, was quoted to the home service as evidence that even Germany's enemies recognized the intensity of her struggle. The quotation pointed out that at "certain sectors" of the eastern front, as many as 40 German counterattacks were made in 24 hours (DIB Holl 1500).

The Luftwaffe was given some attention with the announcement that "several hundred bombers and fighters" had attacked Soviet infantry columns and gun positions at the front. In the last few days, it was added, the Luftwaffe destroyed 140 tanks and 820 vehicles (DIB Holl 1500; German communique).

Following the reading of the German communique, the home press service transmitted the order that the first sentence of the communique was to be omitted. The sentence was: "The entire eastern front is engaged in fierce fighting against the attacking Bolshevist armies" (German communique).

7. Italian Front: Operational reports on the fighting in Italy were confined to a short sentence in the communique: "There was little activity in Italy" (German communique).

Continuing with the theme of the村子 brought to "liberated Europe" by the Allies, German reports repeated the daily items concerned with "freedom and recovery" in central and southern Italy. Rome was said to be subjected to "general liberation," while in Sicily, the storming of wheat stores was reported (GHS 1500, 2000).

The Italian Foreign minister, Cappelli, was said to have started discussions with the Allied Commission and British and American ambassadors concerning the lifting of commercial and financial burdens imposed on Italy as a result of the armistice (DIB Holl 1532).

8. Political Front: An interview with Soviet officers appearing in the Lyon newspaper Finirote was quoted in a home service transmission as saying that Stalin had prepared the Soviet Union for war militarily and politically long before its actual outbreak. The officers were of the opinion, it was reported, that a second world war was necessary "so that Europe could be conquered by the Bolsheviks" (DIB Holl 1500; GHS 0700).

Two transmissions pointed out what was considered Imperialistic aims of the Soviet Union. The first mentioned that a Soviet commission had arrived in Algiers to inspect Mediterranean harbors to determine which of them could be used for the Soviet Mediterranean Fleet. The second claimed that the Soviet Union had required a "further number of ships" of the Soviet Union. Thus, the report was interpreted, Russia's interest in the Suez Canal now equaled that of Great Britain (GHS 1230, 2000).

Growing tension between Bones and the Kremlin was alleged in a transmission to the overseas press, as a result of Bones' refusal to "take up relations" with the Polish Lublin Government. But the real reason, it was emphasized, was the Soviet Union's "demand" for incorporation of certain parts of Slovakia into the Ukrainian Soviet Republic (Transoceanic Morse 1302).

f. Western Europe: The German propaganda machine continued to manufacture countless descriptions of the "misery, chaos, and hunger" in France. English publications were quoted freely: "The Economist - France is on the verge of a catastrophe! Catholic Herald - The Kremlin is agitating the masses of the population to revolt against existing governments. In Lyon, it was claimed, vendors were selling dead ravens to an eager, starving population (GHS 1230, 1700, 2000; DNB Hall 1590).

The Anglo-French finance talks had resulted in no agreements, according to a report quoting the Manchester Guardian. The article, it was added, attributed to rumor the English demand that France pay for all British exported goods in gold (DNB Hall 1122).

g. Eastern Europe: The Congress of Polish-American citizens was said to have published a declaration in which it protested against Soviet and British attempts "to force solutions on Poland or any other nation which are not compatible with their own." Since Soviet plans were for the Bolshevization of Poland, it was concluded, it was "surely the height of hypocrisy" for Stalin to send a telegram to the leader of the Lublin Polska congratulating him on the "liberation of the fraternal Polish people" (DNB Hall 1600; GHS 1400).

h. Southeastern Europe: The previous abundance of reports on the Crock crisis dwindled down to one yesterday, with the announcement over the European press service that approximately 11,000 people had been arrested during, and shortly after, the battle of Athens (DNB Hall 1352).

A home audience broadcast observed that the Soviet Union was now "demanding" that the Carpatho-Ukraine, which is Slovak territory, be incorporated in the Soviet Union. This was seen by Berlin as the normal course of events in countries under the influence of the Soviet Union (GHS 1300).

3. Pacific Front: Relaying reports from Tokyo correspondents, DNB's home service described the American landing on Luzon as "only the first step to a tremendous undertaking that will cause decisive undertakings in the very near future that will be decisive for the entire war in East Asia."

The immediate aim of the Americans was described as getting a foothold on the Chinese mainland in order to build bases for an invasion of Japan. Thus, it was concluded, Japan realized the importance of the battle of Luzon, and of the transfer of the focal point to the "Pacific corridor", explained as extending from the island groups of the central Pacific across the Philippines and Formosa to the Chinese continent (DNB Hall 1660).

Transoceanic's war reporter in Tokyo, Wolfgang Kleinschek, gave a lengthy resume of American strategy on Luzon, stating that the focal point was now south and southeast of Macayan and Dagupan, where the Americans were advancing in a southeasterly direction. This line (Macayan-Dagupan) was said to be running towards Pilar, from which point, it was assumed, the Americans would make a thrust towards Manila, 60 miles to the south (Transoceanic Morse 1629, 1637).

Kleinschek, along with several transmissions, also reported the sinking of 3 January to 13 January, of 121 American ships, comprising nine aircraft carriers, 21 other warships, and 91 transports (Transoceanic Morse 1659; DNB Hall 1222, 1507; GHS 1320).

Summaries of speeches by Prime Minister Koiso and Foreign Minister Shigenobu addressed to the opening of the 86 Japanese Diet were repeated in several broadcasts to the home audience (DNB Hall 1220, 1910; GHS 2000).

Allied Reports: Moscow officially announced that Russian troops were within 125 miles of Berlin. Marshal Koniev's troops were moving rapidly west of the Oder to encircle Frankfurt, while, in the north, the province of East Prussia appeared out of range from the remainder of Germany.

Koniev's First Ukrainian Army was flooding Silesia on a 200 mile front. The Oder River was crossed on a broad front west of Glogau, 30 miles southeast of Frankfurt, and the Red Army was fighting for another bridgehead northeast of Frankfurt. The immediate Soviet objectives seemed to be the occupation of all of Silesia south and east of Frankfurt and the completion of the city's encirclement. German Home Guard battalions together with the remnants of the Heereswacht which managed to escape from Poland were preparing Frankfurt for house-to-house defense as the German High Command was reported preparing to reinforce the city by the Berlin-Frankfurt railway west of the Oder which is still open.

The Germans themselves admit that they failed to halt Marshal Rokossovsky's drive from southern East Prussia. Soviet troops were reported to be standing on the Baltic lagoon, the Princesa Fiord east of Elbing, the Germans also admit a Soviet penetration to within 25 miles of Danzig.

Marshal Zhukov was moving south to occupy the area between Poznan, which Polish forces are now storming, and Marshal Koniev's troops in Silesia. More than 500 towns and villages were occupied yesterday through this area.

Along the southern border of Poland, General Petrowsky's Fourth Ukrainian Army moved to within 25 miles of the Jablonec/Bar which leads into the Czech province of Moravia.

Enemy Reports: Soviet forces succeeded in capturing the Upper Silesian capital of Oppeln after heavy fighting. Most of the Soviet attempts to cross the Oder between Cleswitz and Breslau were repulsed, but fighting continues for some bridgeheads which German troops are narrowed. One Soviet formation which crossed the Oder at Domschen (10 miles northwest of Breslau) was thrown back after 34 tanks were destroyed. Soviet forces attacking west of Breslau were held, but to the southwest they succeeded in pushing closer to the city. Poznan and Torun are holding out against strong Soviet attacks. Peace street fighting is reported from Brodnica.

In East Prussia, the Soviets are attempting to widen their penetrations in the Elbing area against fierce German resistance. The German defensive front in the Kurlisches Lake district was taken back and consolidated. Numerous Soviet breakthrough attempts were held between Allenburg and the Kurlische Fiord.

Soviet forces in the Baltic received reinforcements and continued their attacks. The heaviest of the fighting is southeast of Liegnitz. Most of these attacks were repulsed or had their penetrations sealed off.

German troops made gains in the area west of Budapest. The garrison of the Hungarian capital repelled all Soviet attacks.

Soviet units scored some successes including a breakthrough to the Baltic coast at Glogau which means that East Prussia has been cut off. In general, the drive of the Soviets was flawed by a stiffening German resistance. Poznan and Torun are still in German hands though the loss of Bromberg is officially confirmed. The Soviets also moved closer to Bromberg. In East Prussia the heaviest fighting is along the Przemysl River from which several breakthrough attacks toward Koslinsk were made by Russian troops.
Allied Reports: Allied troops entered the town of the \( \text{\textit{Rhine}} \) river area and occupied German positions in the face of \( \text{\textit{northern fire}} \). In the north east, the British zone of Fort S.O. and Bicker was occupied. Several German counter threats cross S.O. and Fort S.O., but heavy fighting continued south of the city in the Southeast area. Fighter-bombers attacked German transport, armored vehicles and tanks which continue to withdraw from the southern sector.

Small scale for German attacks were reported on the northern left position. German bombings northwest and southwest of Grunau were dispersed by Allied artillery.

Allied troops made gains after crossing the Ill River north of Selonc. Resistance was dispersed in the Illusco-Donau sector against stiff resistance.

Allied fighter-bombers struck along the Minor valley between Das- stadt and Hill House. Railway trains and communication lines in northern and eastern sectors were also hit.

British Second Army troops captured seven towns in 12 hours as the Germans pulled back to the Esteran line. Forces along the Minor River. At no point are Allied troops more than 10 miles from the town.

German troops launched an attack along the 20-mile front from Haugau to the lower town. They succeeded in crossing the east Minor River at several points. The German troops then a series of counter-attacks against the French First Army south of Grunau.

Reports: German troops took the offensive between Esteran and The River. Their presence can be detected near St. Eustace where they made west small gains before being halted in the West End area.

British fighting is continuing for Haugau on the Minor bridgehead southeast of Grunau. Both sides have been particularly active in this narrow sector to the north.

Grenade troops in St. Eustace held a bridgehead across the Lower south of St. Eustace for more than 10 small attacks. British forces are continuing a subversive attack on the town. Opposition was light. Allied attacks near Hill House and were small gains.

Northern Front: Spanish forces have pushed to the west front up to noon today. British units continued their attack and were able to enter Haugau which is now under German control. Spanish units likewise to new positions south of St. Eustace. Allied attacks at St. Eustace were unsuccessful. The German attack in lower Haugau continues to make good progress.

Grenade Front:

British Reports: The German radio audience was reminded that the Soviets were crushed out of east France after deep penetration in the winter of 1940. Right now, the Soviet forces are described as having over-extended themselves and the line was said to be "ripe for the establishment of a stabilized front in the East."

Italian Front:

Allied Reports: French were active on both the Fifth and Eighth Army fronts despite bad weather.

Political Front:

Allied Reports: General de Gaulle held a press conference that "France de Gaulle intends to finish the war without the assurance that a French Army would be permanently installed along the length of the Rhine from one end to the other."

Ljubljana Reports:

London: Allied Reports: Marshal Stalin announced the capture of the Siljanon in the northwest of Opola taken yesterday.

ENEMY BROADCAST PROPAGANDA, TRENDS AND ANALYSIS
Covering broadcasts from 0001 24 January to 0001 25 January
(Prepared by F & P Intelligence Detachment)

1. ENEMY PROPAGANDA. TRENDS: As German troops continued to withdraw from their briefly-held salient in the Ardennes, they were reported approaching the positions near the last salient from which they started their counteroffensive on 16 December. The town of St. Vith was the most recent key locality admittedly yielded to the Americans.

North of this sector, Montgomery’s drive against the Roer River bridgeheads was expected to be followed by an attempt of Canadian forces to advance between the Maas and the Lower Rhine to a point east of Nijmegen.

Several commentators sensed the implications of the Soviet winter offensive, and spoke of the “most dangerous” move facing the German people. They called for the mustering of all available strength to meet the drive and promised that Germany’s holy soil could be defended “to the last breath.”

The tremendous territorial successes of the Russians on the east front were cleared by Dr. Max Krull as evidence that German defenses were only improvised. Acknowledging that the Soviets had entered Bromberg in the central sector and Glienicke in Upper Silesia, Krull nevertheless insisted that some lessening of the speed of the Russian drive could be observed.

3. Eastern Front: With most of Belgium now cleared as the result of “detaching movements,” German troops are again approaching positions near the West Wall from which they started their counteroffensive on 16 December, according to Transocean’s military commentator Ludwig Gorterius.

The Germans were said to have extricated most of the sector between the Schaerbeek and the Schelde river countries, including the town of St. Vith, but farther south at Vizenon they reportedly repulsed 16 American attacks.

Examining Montgomery’s probable objectives in the revived fighting in the House-Roon-Roer triangle, Gorterius surmised that he apparently intended to nail down German forces there and then restore the German bridgeheads across the Roer between Heinsberg and Roermond. In addition, Montgomery was expected to attempt to open the way for a Canadian First Army advance between the Roer and the Lower Rhine to a point east of Nijmegen. Local attacks by the Canadians during the past few days were believed designed to obtain information on the strength of German positions, and increased activity by the Canadians was anticipated in the near future (Transocean March 17).

In connection with fighting in this sector, the communiqué stated that most of the British attacks between Roermond and Gelderkirchen had been frustrated and that the British had pressed back General Lins on only near Heinsberg. The number of British tanks destroyed at the Roer bridgeheads since the first attacks were launched was placed at 150 (German estimate). An overseas broadcast added that British dead already had reached approximately 3,000 to 4,000, and that new formations already had been thrown into the battle (ROS 0045). In the northern sector, it was reported that the American front had collapsed at the Roer Bridge in lower Alsace. The Americans were said to have been cleared from all lowlands north of the Juraen forest, as the German forces continued to advance from their Rhine River bridgeheads (ROS 0700; ROS 0845).

Transocean’s Walter Pinto, describing the action on the southern wing of the front: “The force of the fighting increased considerably on Tuesday. The initiative by almost solely in the hands of the Germans. In order to relieve the American Seventh Army fighting towards the north, the First De Gaulle Army carried out an attack with small points north of Colmar and Thann as well as Soultzheim. Local fighting took place northeast of Strasbourg, and in lower Alsace, the Germans liberated Lauter.
Southeast of Forbach and between Reipertswiller and Mischweiler, the Americans were thrown towards the north" (Transocean Novr 1945).

The American Seventh Army units forced to withdraw from the northeastern part of the German forest were reported to have taken up new positions along its southern rim, where they carried out counterattacks. These were claimed repulsed with heavy losses. On both sides of the town of Forbach, in the Meder sector, major American formations were said to have established new defense lines (DNB Bell Home Service 1945).

A London correspondent was quoted by DNB from Stockholm as stating that the American situation is growing worse north of Stassfurt. From their Rhine bridgehead, the Germans were said to have broken through the Maginot Line and now threaten the Rhine in force were expected (DNB Bell Home Service 1939).

In a violent battle at the mouth of the Scheldt estuary several nights ago, German subs were credited with sinking an Allied transport of 7,000 tons and torpedoing another freighter. Three British E-boats also were reported damaged (Transocean Novr 1945; German compus; GBS 1939).

New Anglo-American bombing attacks were reported over western Germany, and again it was claimed that Allied aircraft had strafed two hospital trains in violation of international law (German compus; DNB Bell Home Service 1939).

In German Home Front: The crucial implications of the mighty Soviet winter offensive seemed to strike German commentators with full impact yesterday, as they spoke repeatedly of the "final danger" now facing Germany and reiterated the resolve of the people to defend their holy soil "to the last breath."

The importance of employing all available strength and meeting the situation with strong nerves was emphasized in an evening transmission for the domestic press. "We have been given a very hard, but decisive job," it stated. "We attack it, and we are ready for any sacrifice. The hour of our greatest test finds us strong and inspired by our national will to fight to the last" (DNB Bell Home Service 1939).

Dr. Joseph Schall, in his nightly "Review of the Situation" asked for an increase of the strength of the nation in its hour of decision. "This next dangerous of all threats to have faced so far must be crushed," he declared.

Pointing out that the High Command is still in the stage of improvised countermeasures to delay the Soviet forces, and that plans for rebuilding a new defensive front were now being drawn up, Dr. Schall acknowledged that the Army and Volkstum would not be expected to bear the entire burden of the assault and were counting on the support of the entire nation. For this reason, he explained, everyone would be expected to make more sacrifices and to obey new decrees forbidding travel and letter-writing and further limiting food supplies.

Again, Dr. Schall returned to the Bolshevist danger to spur the nation's fighting spirit, citing Anglo-American treachery to Europe in yielding one country after another to the Soviet, and asserting that only the strength of Germany itself now could stem the Red tide.

New successes on the battlefield were seen strengthening Soviet political demands, and bringing Stalin closer to his ultimate aim of world revolution. Complete victory in Poland now is followed by Soviet domination of the German government, with British grain abetting the exile government to the Bolshevists, said Dr. Schall (GBS 1939).

In a metaphorical statement of the German dilemma, Schwarz von Berg declared: "If the nooses at the door and the hearts of the German people. We all know perfectly well what the mighty assault of the Soviets means...the fate of Europe depends on the battles now being waged by Germany."

Interpreting the key evening propaganda broadcast, von Berg reported the bravery and courage with which the German people are meeting the decisive Russian offensive. He cited the case of a boy of 10, conscripted to death by court-martial for assisting in German soldiers; a boy of 10, evicted from the east, who was willing to live in a corridor in Berlin; and the workingmen who walked hundreds of miles through German land after their machines had been moved westward. "A people whose spirit is driven by such ideals and by such willingness to sacrifice cannot be called desensitized," he asserted.

Von Berg compared the Russian invasion to the Wannmecht's drive into western Europe in 1916, pointing out that the Germans have not displayed the "feeling of panic" which struck the peoples of Brussels and Paris. Evacuations from the east and the arrival of refugees in Berlin were said to be going on without confusion and without excitement, even though the people "fully realize the gravity of this hour."
Stating that the German nation during the past five and a half years has absorbed every blow and found the strength to fight on again, von Bong predicted that this would happen again in the east. As an example, he cited the sufferings of Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bamberg, and other cities lashed by Allied bombs, "which have suffered the same or even more than the people in the east," and where life is still going on.

After explaining that persons could not bear from relatives in the east because of personal restrictions and reassuring the people that they should not be concerned by the loss of German towns since this is a "fight for the existence of the entire nation," von Bong said there were three factors to keep in mind at this time:

1. He had a clear conscience, in the knowledge that all Germans have contributed their will to the gigantic struggle. As examples of self-sacrifice, one can look at officers fighting in a tank with one arm or one leg; German lads pleading to return to the front despite numerous wounds; mothers who have given their whole families to the war.

2. We are confident we are fighting for a just cause, for economic and political security, to defend ourselves against criminal exploitation by the Allies.

3. The morale of our troops is excellent, and enemy breakthroughs do not deter them from their final aim (GHS 1945).

Other home service transmissions, likewise stressing the east front battles as "a matter of the existence of destruction of a whole nation," pointed to the heroism of the army and Volksturm as they fight for every foot of ground.

A small Volkssturm unit in Northland gathered reports destroyed four tanks; at Ablit, a unit of the labor corps was said to have smashed three Soviet tanks; and around Volwog, Volkssturm battalions were credited with 14 tanks (DNB 1944, 2100).

Soldiers who became hero infantrymen in the evacuation from Crete were praised in an ensuing domestic broadcast. The story of the evacuation of the German fleet to the Mutini, along with the occupation troops in Greece, was reviewed, and the difficulties of weather and terrain together with attacks by Partisans were said to have sorely tested the German troops (GHS 1943).

The debate in Washington over Roosevelt's dismissal of Secretary of Commerce Jones and appointment of Henry Stimson in his place received considerable attention. The resultant crisis in Congress developing from this action was seen likely to cause increased tension between the President and the Congressmen (GHS 1940; DNB 1941, 129).

On his birthday, Field Marshal Model was commended for creating a new defense line after theavenous breakthroughs leading to the battle of Arnhem and the operations between the Meuse and Scheldt; holding out at Arnhem; and driving the German counteroffensive forward into the Ardennes (GHS 1940).

b. Eastern Front: The German’utilized territorial successes by Soviet forces was seen by DNB’s Dr. Max Krull in evidence of the improvised character of the German offensives on the eastern front, and were said to indicate clearly that a crisis had developed.

Krull attributed much of the speed of the Red Army to the cold weather which he said made possible rapid advances by tank formations. Thus, the Soviets entered brooks from the west and Minsk (Upper Silesia) from the northwest. "This made the value of any previously prepared positions partially illusory." But wherever these defenses could be employed, Krull quickly added, a lessening of Soviet speed was observable.

The eastern flank of the Upper Silesia industrial region, and the battlefield east of Minsk were territories to the east.

The pressure against Ebing had increased, the commentator continued, thereby raising the danger of operation for East Prussia. To the east, Krull admitted that the front had been withdrawn by the Germans to the Mauritan Line, thereby making the defense of East Prussia much more advantageous for the German Forces.

The Eastern Front provided Krull with reason for optimism, as he explained that although the Soviets attacked north of Prussia and northwest of Dublin, they were completely repulsed. "This German success introduces a new note into the fighting in the east."

In summary, Krull said that the German forces were beginning again in the direction of momentum, and Soviet troops were threatened with entrenchment and had to withdraw to the southwest of Silesia and to the east. "This is the introduction to a Soviet reverse," Krull observed (DNB 2035).
Operational reports on the eastern front battles flooded transmissions throughout the day. A summary follows:

The activity has extended its winter offensive to the Kurland where tremendous battles are raging south of Rausenburg, northeast of Lieben, and northwest of Doblen. In the eastern sector of East Prussia, fighting shifted to the Masurian lakes. Between Lazenburg and Kaminski, a fierce battle raged on the Przem and Dune rivers. Lazenburg was evacuated after street fighting. In their efforts to sever East Prussia, the Soviets reached the region south of Elbing and Neurungan, by breaking through the German Front between Deutsch-blyen and Allenstein.

Kalisz, Poznan and the Bromberg Gau in Poland were scenes of heavy fighting. To the east, a major German formation sought its way to the west from Kulcow and linked up with a tank corps.

Soviet pressure increased on the Oder river between Kasel and Brigg. Grin fighting is in progress for Oppeln (reported taken by the Soviets) and Ciechowitz. East of Breslau, German counterattacks threw back the Soviets from several localities. These German forces had remained behind in the depth of the battlefront and were now able to fight their way forward.

All these reports were reviewed by Transocean's Karl Hausser, and given in the following transmissions: GHS 0700; 1930; Transocean Horse 1210, 1225, 1235, 1240, 1627, 1630; DNB Home Service 1630; German comqui.

German forces claimed to have broken through the Soviet lines between Stahlwiesen and Lake Solchen, and to have opened the arrows between Lake Velnonze and the Danube. Stahlwiesen was reported taken. On the Sudetian border, Soviet advances said to have been halted (GHS 1230, 1400; DNB Home Service 1600; German comqui). Several units of the Ninth and the Sixth SS were identified in Hungary (GOS 0845; DNB Home Service 1600).

d. Italian Front: Activity on the Italian front was confined to Allied attack in the central and western sectors, according to operational reports. Southwest of Lake Cervia, a German reconnaissance sorti was said to have captured several British pill-boxes, and to have taken prisoners (Transocean Horse 1200; German comqui).

Severe unrest was reported from the Sardinian town of Castiglione, where, it was added, the population used arms and bombs against the British police. The military was allowed to have taken "drastic measures" (DNB Home Service 1210; GHS 1400).

America's printing of Italian banknotes was interpreted as indicating that Italy had been reduced to the status of a colonial power (GHS 1230).

e. Political Front: With reference to the memorandum of the Polish Eille Government suggesting that the administration of Poland be controlled by an Inter-Allied Control Commission and peace and order be maintained by Allied troops, German propagandists observed that the Polish question had now been placed in the hands of Great Britain and the U.S.

Churchill bowed Poland and delivered her to Stalin while Roosevelt gave his blessing: it was said. In an added attempt to induce Allied indifference to Poland's problems, the commentary pointed out that the American ambassador to the Polish Government in London, Mr. Line, was "still wandering around in the U.S. without even thinking of taking up his post in London" (DNB Home Service 0845).

f. Southeastern Europe: Commenting on the dismissal of the London Yugoslav Government of King Peter, Berlin claimed that it was merely the next step in the Bolshevisation of Jugoslovakia which had been the aim of Stalin's foreign policy as well as that of Churchill who had "sold out" England's former ally.

London made Peter King in order to bring Jugosovia into the war as another enemy of Germany, supported Peter and "used" his while England had political aspirations in the Balkans and now, London has hanged Jugosovia over to Stalin, German propagandists said.

Today, Churchill denies to the tune of Stalin's whistle, the commentary continues, and the first "false performance" was in the speech to the lower house. "Peter is no more, but will soon be completely out of the picture" (DNB Home Service 0606).

While the Yugoslav government was said to have ignored the king's move and to have ordered all Yugo-Slav emissaries of the communists to continue with their work and to proceed to Belgrade in accordance with the Yugo-Slavite agreement (DNB Home Service 1710), Considerable British press comment was quoted with respect to the situation existing in the Yugoslav government (DNB Home Service 1120, 1710).

New battles were reported to have broken out in Salonika between the ELAS and formations of General Plastiras. The Associated Press quoted as having said that the farther from Athens one went, the less sympathy one found for the Plastiras Government (DNB Holl Home Service 1130, 1135; GHS 2000).

An increase in anti-Soviet tendencies in Bulgaria was reported from Bratislava, via Radio Moscow. "Foreign elements" were said to have made propaganda among the students (DNB Holl Home Service 1120).

Pacific Front: Operational reports of the fighting on Luzon were limited to repetitions of announcements made on previous days. Nothing new was added (GSC 08:5).

Imperial Japanese Headquarters was quoted as claiming 13 Superfortresses destroyed and 50 damaged in the 70 plane raid on Nagoya Tuesday. At the same time, 46 aircraft were reported shot down and 38 damaged in the American raid on Oshiwaga (DNB Holl Home Service 1130, 1135; GHS 1100).

The President of the Japanese Technical Institute was alleged to have said that "the time is not far off when Japan will put into action many new weapons" (DNB Holl Home Service 1135).

New fighting was said to have flared up on Rabaul, and other transmissions described Japanese drives in the province of Kwantung in China (DNB Holl Home Service 1155, 1130). The sinking of one battleship and another warship east of Formosa was attributed to the Kamikaze corps (GHS 2000).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Although some losses were suffered in the disengaging movement in the Ardennes, the bulk of German forces which participated in the December counteroffensive have returned to positions behind the West Wall with their fighting power virtually unimpaired, according to Transocean's Ludwig Sertorius.

There was some revival of activity on the western front, with the local points in Central Luxembourg, along the River Ror and in Lower Alsace. New American gains were reported along the Clerf River between St. Vith and the town of Debroirch in Luxembourg, while the British were continuing their attacks against German River bridgeheads on the west bank. In Alsace, the Germans were said to have resisted furious American attacks on the west side of the River.

In an evening talk to the domestic audience, Hans Knittel pointed out that the people of Germany are now suffering the same hardships of evacuation from war sector which advancing German armies once brought to foreign countries. He pictured the endless stream of refugees fleeing the Soviet terror in eastern Germany.

Acknowledging a Soviet gain of approximately 100 miles along the entire front, since the start of the winter offensive, Voelkischer Beobachter said the Russians had not achieved their principal aim of crushing the German Army. It was claimed that the drive had lost its initial impetus and German forces were now able to erect new defense lines.

2. ENEMY NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:

a. SALERNT FORCES SAFELY RESTORED TO WEST WALL POSITIONS

b. GERMAN PEOPLE NOW SUFFER HARDSHIPS OF FLIGHT FROM WAR

c. SOVIETS HAVE DIED TO CRUSH GERMAN ARMY

d. ROME STUDENTS DEMONSTRATE AGAINST MILITARY SERVICE

e. GERMANS ARE PHYSICALLY AND MENTALLY INJURED

f. SULIC TO PREPARE PERIODS DISMISSAL IN SCHOOL

g. DECISIVE BATTLE OF LUXEMBOURG NOT YET IN SIGHT

3. Western Front: The bulk of German forces which in December broke into Belgium have now withdrawn to protected positions behind the Siegfried Line with their fighting power virtually unimpaired, asserted Transocean's military correspondent Ludwig Sertorius.

"It is true that the disengagement movements resulted in some losses because of Allied air superiority," said Sertorius, "but these losses were within normal limits. Even our adversaries have recognized our masterful withdrawal, and it is significant that their front reports in recent weeks have made no mention of prisoners or booty."

Sertorius said the Allies pressing forward from the Ardennes were gradually approaching positions from which they were ejected when the German counteroffensive began. He predicted that "for reasons of prestige" the Americans would attempt to recapture positions lost during the German push, but indicated that because of previous experiences with the improvisability of the West Wall Montgomery would not attempt to launch a frontal attack against German fortifications in the Eifel sector (Transocean Horse 1624). Referring to activity in Central Luxembourg (the Eifel region), Transocean Walter Plate acknowledged American gains along the Clerf River between Debroirch and St. Vith, and reported strong pressure against the entire German front in the former "bulge" area from Monschau to Trier.

Further to the north, where fighting has revived along the Rhine River, Plato reported new British attacks against the German River bridgeheads on both sides of Heinsberg. The British managed to press nearer the road from Heinsberg to Roermond and south of it to the Rhine, said Plato, but their "breakthrough attempts failed along the entire front."

Other transmissions mentioned that the British had advanced with 80 tanks, gaining a penetration northwest of Heinsberg that was later "sealed off." The British were said to have entered Monschau in the Heinsberg area, but south of Roermond, it was claimed the German forces had recaptured several localities (German camps; Dbl-Nel 1720; Cdr 2200).

Below Heinsberg, the American Ninth Army was reported to have joined the British assault on the Rhine River with attacks on German positions on both sides of Lieth, while to the northwest, German forces were said to have repulsed new British blows.
against their Moselle River bridgehead east of Geultruidenberg.

In the southern sector, German formations on the west bank of the Meuse River in Lower Alsace resisted a fierce American onslaught, said Pinto, as 18 attacks were launched within 11 hours. The Germans also were reported holding on to their bridgeheads west and southwest of Nancy, and to have taken the villages of Niefern and Kindwiller. In Upper Alsace, German troops warned off several attacks south of Strasbourg, in the Estain and Cethain sectors (Tennessean Horse 1935).

Revising the fighting in Lower Alsace, W.H.S. Allen Schlesselman claims that the territory recaptured by the German troops during the past few weeks was more than four American armies could take beyond the German frontier in several months despite their loss of "more than 50,000 men and thousands of tanks" (DNB 1249).

One transmission noted a "tremendous concentration" of forces of the Sixth Army Group in the Siegfried area, and said reconnaissance activity was taking place along the Rhine bridgeheads north of Strasbourg. A new attempt to break through to the Rhine in this sector was anticipated (DNB Hall 1848).

B. German Home Front: As German towns in the east are engulfed by the mighty Soviet offensive, German women and children are suffering the same hardships of flight and evacuation which advancing German armies once brought to foreign countries commentator Hans Fritsche acknowledged last night.

It is now our women and children who are flowing before the scourges of the war, and our highways which are clogged with an endless stream of refugees, said Fritsche. And the German soldier, who felt "deep sympathy" when he witnessed the forced evacuation of people in western Europe, feels even greater pity today when he sees his own people streaming along the roads in extreme cold and running from the Soviet horror.

Expressing almost too naive amazement at the speed of the Soviet drive, Fritsche stated: "Only a few days after the mighty Russian assault started, German towns became the focal point of the battle, even though we had considered them safe and far behind the front lines. And yesterday, today or tomorrow German localities appear in reports of the fighting, it is actually beyond our conception." The age-old threat that were are forced on Germany was played against again by Fritsche. He attributed the First World War to Allied plans for the "emasculation of Germany" and said the current war had its roots in the "scandalous" Treaty of Versailles, from which the German nation was forced to "detach itself."

"Our countries would not permit a rehabilitation of Germany, a return to a normal standard of health, and this terrible struggle for life or death began," he asserted.

Citing the manner in which British overcame its crises and the Soviet Union struck back after bitter defeats, Fritsche called on the German people for similar steadfastness in countering the threat to Germany's existence. He offered the encouragement that although German defensive measures to this point had been only "improvised," a new front was being prepared with calm and confidence (GHS 1945).

In a short "Review of the Situation" at noon, Dr. Glotzchel, a newcomer to the home service program, jumped from one subject to another before reaching the inevitable conclusion that the German people is gathering all its strength and bringing to bear all its energies to hold off the Russian offensive and win the war.

Pointing out that the war had reached the same disputed areas over which Britain attacked Germany in 1939, Dr. Glotzchel spoke of the irony of the fate of these lands, which now were overrun by the Bolsheviks and were not in Polish or German hands.

Dr. Glotzchel also praised the splendid solidarity of German news reports compared to the silence and falsity of Allied information services; reiterated the sinister Bolshevik plans for conquest of Europe; recalled that East Prussia had been cut off from the Reich many times during German history, and later was restored to the Fatherland; and stressed Germany's role in the battle for the preservation of European culture (GHS 1936).

The comment that the Soviets have organized special commands for the purpose of liquidating the entire civilian population in conquered territories was made in a report to the European press. It was claimed that Russian tank spearheads had left 10,000 dead on the road from Lods to Pozon (DNB Hall 1937).

German parents were assured that children's evacuation camps in the eastern battle area had been safely transferred to the interior, and it was asserted that none of the children had been captured (GHS 2000).

C. Eastern Front: Admitting that the Soviets had made an advance in their offensive of approximately 100 miles, Voelkleinher Benschthor said in an article that the Soviets had failed in their chief aim in the east — to crush the German Army. The article added that the Red Army had been forced to regroup its forces, and the Germans were taking advantage of the respite by creating new defense lines. The article concluded by saying that the offensive had lost its original impetus (DNB Holl 1126).
Reviewing the battles in Upper Silesia, Poland and East Prussia, Transocean's Karl Blücher said that the 15th day of the Soviet offensive was characterized by serious struggles, in the course of which the Soviets were able to gain further ground. As presented by Blücher, the German view of the situation in the east front by front was as follows: Koniev was credited with several deep breaches into the Upper Silesian industrial region, and with having outflanked Breslau by crossing the Oder. He was reported to have forced back over the river. Heavy tank battles were taking place southeast of Breslau.
Zhukov's forces were said to have been halted by German positions on the Oder, a tributary of the Vistula, which forms the eastern border of Brandenburg. Other Soviet formations of the First White Russian Army had advanced northwest and southwest of Poznan to the former German-Polish border of 1939. East of Schladenmühl, the Soviets were placed at the northern bank of the Netze River. Further north, the towns of Marienwerder, Kulm, and Gahrum on the Vistula were claimed to be German bridgeheads which acted as stepping stones to the Soviet flood.
Rokossovsky was reported to have advanced to Marienwerder in East Prussia, and bitter house-to-house fighting was taking place. At that point, the Soviets had cut the railroad line from Königsburg-Schladenmühl-Börzin which went through the city. During an attack on Königsburg, Russian forces advanced towards the west north of the Frische River along the Marienwerder road, as well as to the east of the Baltic coast. In the process, the Soviet attack towards Königsburg, the town of Elbing was the scene of bitter fighting. Soviet breakthrough attempts between the Elbe River and the Maurin Lakes were reported frustrated, and followed by fluctuating fighting (Transocean Morse 1247, 1258, 1500, 1503, 1310).
Immeasurable transmissions agreed with Blücher's dispatches and the only additions made were estimates of the damage inflicted on the Soviets, the number of divisions engaged in certain sectors, descriptions of the harried state of German soldiers and the Vellatura, and reports of daring performances by the Luftwaffe.
The battle for Budapest, now in its final week, was extremely fierce, according to German reports, and the German-Hungarian forces in the city were said to be sparing no offensive success after another. The Hungarian Home Guard and the Budapest Police Force were reported to be also participating against the Soviets.
To the west of the Hungarian capital, German forces continued their advance north of Szolnok-Császárfalva, it was said (GHS 0845; GHS 1400, 1930, 2230; DNB Holl 1140; German comique).

4. Italian Front: Heavy reconnaissance activity was reported from the central Italian coast, west and northwest of Venice. Both sides were said to have participated (German comique).
Mass demonstrations in protest to the British government's calling up of Italian youth for military service was reported to have been made by students in Rome. An unnamed Communist newspaper was alleged to have interpreted the demonstrations as proof of the resurgence of Fascism in Italy (GHS 1250).

5. Western Europe: A Daily Express correspondent was quoted as saying that the Belgians were physically and morally exhausted. The correspondent was alleged to have witnessed the situation during a lengthy stay in Brussels. Other features of the article were: the expansion of the black market, valueless credit of paper money, and the steep increase in bartering as the only form of marketing. The rising was labelled a "social anomaly" (Transocean Morse 1068).

6. Southeastern Europe: Announcing that King Peter and Premier Subasio had reached an agreement, and that Subasio was returning to Belgrade, Belin spokesman concluded that he would be able to prepare for Peter's dismissal once he arrived.
Bosnian Neschivaton was quoted to the effect that Marshal Tito had ceased to show any concern over the Jugoslav political crisis because England was supporting him no matter what the outcome might be (GHS 0900, 1900).
The Platinian government was reported to have told ADM to send only Communist diplomats to the forthcoming conference in Athens. A press transmission said that according to a BBC report the liberation of Greece had introduced fear into the country. German propaganda attributed to "National Greek circles" the remark that English propaganda had led the Greeks to civil war and had created the foundation for that fear (GHS 1500; DNB Holl 1208).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Speaking on the 12th anniversary of his rise to power, Adolf Hitler last night called on the German people to make every sacrifice and to fight with utmost fanaticism until Germany's war efforts are crowned with victory. He said the internal power of resistance of the German people could hold off the Soviet offensive if the entire community concentrated its strength against the encroaching armies.

In an analysis of Soviet military potentialities in the east, Lt. Gen. Dittmar said the current offensive was more dangerous to Germany than the drive in 1944 or the breakthrough last summer. This attack is being made with more energy, greater superiority of numbers and better technical equipment, and the Russian tank spearheads have advanced with great speed behind the German lines, said Dittmar.

A stiffening of Soviet pressure was noted in transmissions reporting the east front fighting. The German objectives were said to be the establishment of "barrier fronts" and later the concentration of forces for a counter-blow.

On the western front, the increasing Allied attacks from the Neva to Alsace were viewed as the prelude to a large-scale offensive.

2. B/R/\NY NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA
   a. Hitler calls on German people for "every sacrifice".
   b. Allied attacks seem as probable to major offensive.
   c. Situation in East worser than in 1941: Dittmar.
   d. German High Command prepared for super-offensive in East.

Hitler's Speech: For the second time in a month Adolf Hitler spoke to the German people last night, once again calling on them to make every sacrifice and to continue the fight with fanaticism until victory.

Hitler made only passing reference to the Soviet advances, asserting that the terrible fates unfolding on the eastern front "could be averted if we concentrate all our strength.

The address, marking the 12th anniversary of Hitler's rise to power on 30 January 1933, started at 2215 and lasted for 17 minutes. It was believed to be one of the shortest ever delivered by Hitler and was less than half as long as his New Year's eve message.

In contrast to his previous speech, when his voice sounded dull and lifeless, Hitler sounded to have regained some of his former fire. He spoke in clear, emphatic tones, raising his voice explosively several times but never reaching his once-famous hysterical pitch.

Discrediting recent statements by Anglo-American leaders promising better treatment of a defeated Germany, Hitler pointed out that their promises were of no consequence because they would never be in a position to keep them, in view of Bolshevik supremacy. "I should like to tell those statesmen that my attempt to offset National Socialist Germany through the use of Western phrases takes for granted a situation which is unknown in Germany today," he declared.

The internal power of resistance developed within Germany when the new government found the strength to overcome attempts to destroy it commercially was characterized as the key to Germany's ability to hold off the combined military blows of its enemies today.

The theme that "bourgeois society" and liberalism have outlived their usefulness, which was highlighted in his last speech, was again mentioned by Hitler. Bourgeois society is about to be destroyed, he said, and only nations in which authoritative power is based on the equal rights of all and the equal duties of all are capable of solving the great questions of the time.

Threatening that all who show weakness and betray the nation will die a dishonorable death, Hitler said it was everyone's duty in this hour of crisis to fight honorably together to save his own life and that of his loved ones. "The Almighty has created our people, and if we defend our existence we are defending His work," he declared. "That this defense is connected with immeasurable suffering, misery and sorrow serves only to bring us closer together and develops the strength to fulfill our duty even in the most terrible crisis. . . . We must fortify our hearts and harden our resolution to fight no matter where and under what circumstances until victory crowns our efforts."

In a personal pledge to the people, Hitler said: "My life is exclusively devoted to my duty. There remains only one objective, to work and to fight until the hand of fate extinguishes my life. . . . I shall disregard danger to my personal life, carried on by the unshakeable conviction that the Almighty will not desert me whose aim is to save his people from an undeserved fate."

Calling for "every sacrifice" and the "unostentatious" by a united community, Hitler said he was now asking only "that everyone who can fight, fights; that everyone who can work, works; and that all make their sacrifices with the one thought of safeguarding freedom and national honor and thus their future life (GHS 2216; DB Bell 2207).

Western Front

Increasing Allied attacks along the entire front from the Lacs to Flers were viewed in German reports as the preliminary steps in preparation for large-scale offensive operations. There was some difference of opinion as to whether the forthcoming drive would assume major proportions. Transocean military correspondent, Dr. Walter Platt, doubted that it would be more than an attempt by Eisenhower to "do something to demonstrate to the Soviets his willingness to tie up German forces and to prevent the shifting of German reserves from the west to the east," but the other Transocean military correspondent, Walter Platt, predicted it would be a mass offensive.

Declaring that the Anglo-American forces are undoubtedly not as strong as they were before the German counteroffensive on 16 December, Platt stated confidently that even an all-out Allied offensive in the west "could be washed off by the Germans without engaging their reserve forces to any considerable extent."

"Even if the natural attrition of German shock units withdraw from Belgium is taken into consideration," Platt stated, "the situation is such that stopping a new Anglo-American large-scale offensive would require a smaller display of forces than it did last fall. Therefore, the possibility still exists of shifting strong reserve forces from our front in the west to other theaters of war" (Transocean Horse 1550).

Platt said the current Allied operations were designed to establish bases from which the principal attacks could be launched, and added that the outline of the impending blow could already be seen at the points where the Allies are currently attacking.

In Holland, Platt said, Canadian forces supported by tanks made a "slight dent" in the German lines north of Capelle and southeast of Breda, while to the southeast, the British were reported to have carried out two attacks between Brussels and Ghent in an effort to cross the Meuse River at Maasburch.

Ascertaining that American pressure had increased along the entire front from Monschau to Sassenheim, where the Germans opened their December offensive, Platt stated that the focal point of the attacks had shifted northward to the region between Ebenborn and St. Vith and that German units were forced to yield several villages near Builinburg. In northern Luxembourg, the Americans crossed the Our River near Ebenwarden, Platt reported, and near the confluence of the Sure, Moselle and Sure Rivers a grim battle was taking place for Builinburg Castle north of Wadnah in the Gerselz area.

On the southern front, the Germans were ordered to have improved their positions between Blackwall and the Rhine, but to have been attacked fiercely by American forces on the eastern salient and on either side of the Meppehobler-Markhobler Road. An Allied gain of two kilometers was acknowledged in the woods west of the Rhine-Moselle Canal, and farther north, French units attacking between Colmar and Mulhouse were said to have "scored only minor gains" (Transocean Horse 1540; GHS 2200; German campaign DB Bell Home Service 1620).

In却又s broadcast announced that the Allies suffered 100,000 casualties since 16 December, and that an additional 26,000 men were taken prisoner. Material losses were placed at 2,722 tanks destroyed, 125 planes and glider planes shot down and 156 guns captured. The 32nd and 101st Airborne Divisions were reported "almost completely wiped out" (GHS 08145).
Comparing the present drive to the Russian offensive in 1914, Dittmar said the situation is more dangerous for Germany this time because the push is being made with more energy, and with an array superior in numbers and equipped with the best available technical inventions. To counteract this night, he continued, Germany is counting on its spiritual superiority, based on a united national feeling and community spirit that was lacking during the First World War.

Dittmar said the Soviet assault was similar to that in the summer of 1944, in view of the heavy artillery bombardments, the tank breakthroughs and the infiltration in depth into German lines. But, he added, this time "the Soviet tanks advanced with even more speed behind the rear of the German lines."

Drawing some encouragement from reports that no major German formations have fallen into Russian hands, Dittmar said the objective of destroying the German army was being neglected because of the far-flung offensive aims of the offensive. He also affirmed that the speed of the drive had now slowed considerably as a result of increased German defense and the enforced delay until the infantry reaches the Soviet tank spearheads.

Developments in Upper Silesiae were viewed by Dittmar with particularly "serious concern" because of the requirements there, and he said the fighting in this sector was extremely "violent" and the situation "tense."

Emphasizing the difficulties of the High Command in deploying its forces for the "battles which will decide our fate," Dittmar said their immediate objective is to "strike a balance" for the disposition of German troops on all fronts.

Dittmar acknowledged that the massive quantity of forces thrown in by the Soviets could not be matched, but suggested that the superior "quality" of German units was already showing itself in individual successes by small formations.

The renewed Russian activity in Hungary, Croatia and Slovakia, in conjunction with the main offensive, was attributed to political considerations. It was pointed out that the Soviets hope to bolster their political aims by creating accomplished military facts (GHS 1945).

In the regular "Review of the Situation," Hans Hertel developed the theme that Germany would resist its outside enemies today with the same strength that enabled the new Nazi party to overcome Communists, Socialists, the bourgeoisie and the state itself when it first came to power 18 years ago.

Criticalizing the Anglo-Americans for "stabbing Germany in the back" and their failure to realize that Germany is protecting them against the Bolshevik danger, Hertel said that even the great coalition of powers now arrayed against Germany would not be able to overcome a fanatical will for victory (GHS 1945).

Other broadcasts noted the 2oth anniversary of Hitler's rise to power, citing the accomplishments of Hitler in resisting the bolshevization of Europe and praising the progress Germany has made under Hitler (GHS 1940, 1941).

Eastern Front: The German High Command was said to be engaged in two major tasks on the eastern front, according to an unnamed Berlin correspondent: first, the establishment of "barrier fronts" by formations operating within the battle zone; second, the concentration of all forces for a counter-attack corresponding to the proportions of the Soviet "super-offensive" (Transocean's Record 1945).

Most operational reports agreed that a noticeable slackening of pressure by the Red Army had taken place, and that the Germans had started attacks in local sectors. Transocean's Karl Blumauer, reviewing each sector, gave a brief description of the situation in the east, which, along with several other dispatches, presented the following general picture:

Soviet offensive action in the Oder area, between Kosel and Czerny, had decreased considerably, and the Germans had seized the initiative. The city of Steinsin, sandaled the previous day, was liberated from the Soviets.

In the Oder sector, the Soviets started a drive in a westerly direction, penetrating the towns of Kurlin, Kolberg, and Ostritz, and the town of Stolp on the north of the Oder. Between Schrenmaul and Jutin, the Soviets advanced northward.

German forces were pressed back along the shore of the Frisian Gulf in the Soviet drive for Koenigsburg, but the city itself had become a frontal zone. The defenders of the city are the same troops that fought at Eisenhower and the Romania North. Fighting in the city was in progress. To the south, the German counter-attack to the east reached the Royal river between Koenigsburg and the area west of Ribbing. The garrison of Ribbing was defending itself stubbornly.

Hundstorfer also said that it was noted with satisfaction in Berlin that the Soviet High Command was now speaking of increasing resistance by the German.

The communiques devoted only one sentence to the Kurland fighting, describing it as "only of local character." Another report stated that the reason for the success of the German troops in this area was that they had more kamikaze-corps than any other fighting group (GHS 1930; German comm.: 3).

German naval units were said to have participated in the battles on the eastern front for the first time, when they assembled off the northern coast of the Saarland Peninsula, and fired on Russian positions at Grenz on the Kurisches Haff (Transocean Horse 1935; German comm.: 3).

The reports on the fighting in Hungary were brief and mentioned only that Soviet attacks between Lake Balaton and the Danube were repulsed. The position at Budapest was said to have continued to resist the Soviets. The Germans lost only one block of the Hungarian capitol to the Russians, it was added. On the entire Hungarian front, the Soviets have lost 200 tanks in the past three days, several transmissions announced (DNB Hall Home Service 1935; German comm.: 3).

Transocean's air commentator, Karl Zeppelin, gave a brief summary of the employment of the Luftwaffe on the eastern front, and commented on the lack of Soviet planes yet sent into battle. Zeppelin also suggested that there had been the expectation that Anglo-American air attacks would be synchronized with the Soviet offensive, but, he added, the weather upset all plans. Further evidence that the plan would not be used, Zeppelin said, was the fact that for the past two days, Allied air attacks had been directed against the hinterland of the western front (Transocean Horse 0906).

Italian Front: Operational reports on the fighting in Italy were limited to one sentence: "In central Italy, northeast of Rome, patrols wiped out several strongly fortified enemy bunkers" (German comm.: 3).

Commenting on the "horrible cold" on the Italian front, one broadcast to the home audience noted that "neither side can light fires, because the smoke betrays their positions and draws enemy fire" (GHS 1930).

The French news agency, AFP, was alleged to have remarked, concerning the "catastrophic food situation" in home: "Road is a word that reminds one of the past. The misery of the people is indescribable" (DNB Hall Home Service 1230).

Political Front: The conference planned for some time of the Big Three United Nations was now in progress, an overseas press transmission claimed. This supposition was based on a Reuters report which said it would not be surprising if reports from the Tripartite Conference were received any hour. In speculating on the location of the meeting, a British correspondent was quoted as saying that in deference to the present Soviet offensive, the conference was probably being held at a point where Stalin could keep in contact with his commanders (Transocean Horse 0900).

Berlin concluded, from the fact that Harry Hopkins had conferred with De Gaulle, Ribbentrop, and was on his way to Rome, that Britain was to be excluded from all future discussions concerning Allied policy in Europe (DNB Hall Home Service 1150).

Western Europe: Several German transmissions gave prominence to the results of a poll taken by the "Sondages et Statistiques," described as France's Gallup Institute, which revealed that 54% of the Frenchmen questioned "had not imagined Anglo-American occupation to be what it was, and were disappointed." Every report emphasized that the questionnaire had been addressed only to those Frenchmen who had resisted the Germans, and members of the underground (GHS 1700; DNB Hall Home Service 1836).

American billboards and announcements recently posted in and near Bastogne and other Belgian towns were said to have been shown to press representatives at a special reception in Berlin. One of them, it was said, strictly forbade the carrying of any soldiers on military vehicles, even if the vehicles were empty. Others were claimed to have furnished evidence of the hunger and distress existing in Belgium. The documents were brought to Berlin by Jef van der Wiele, leader of the Flemish Liberation Movement, it was added (Transocean Horse 0809).

Southeastern Europe: German reports capitalized on the announcement that King Peter had renounced his rights to the throne, and reported the occupation throughout the day that Great Britain had betrayed Yugoslav and sacrificed Peter to Tito and the Bolsheviks (GHS 1230; DNB Hall Home Service 1610, 1609).

Transmissions to the home press reported a German report from Serbistan that women of the Zeppelin region had revolted against the Soviet deportation of children to an unknown destination. In addition, it was added, all men between 16 and 60 were arrested and placed in military camps (DNB Hall Home Service 1410).

Other transmission played up the reports that British prisoners recently released by IJNS had complained of poor treatment; and that the chances of a permanent settlement of the Greek problem had not increased since the EJ/J had protested to the limiting of their delegates to three (DNB Hall Home Service 1245, 1890).

1. Pacific Front: Allied naval losses during the landing operations on Luzon, released by Bond, were enumerated in broadcasts to the home audience as follows: five aircraft carriers, six destroyers (American); three destroyers (British); one destroyer and cruiser (French); one battleship (formerly Italian); and several smaller naval units (GHS 0900, 1400).

Further Japanese reports were given to the effect that American strength on Luzon totalled seven divisions, two of them armored, and that 6,000 men had already been put out of the fight. New landings on Luzon were predicted. At the same time, one report claimed that an American convoy of 90 ships had been sighted cruising in the waters around Surigao, at the northern tip of Mindanao (GHS 1700; DNB Hall Home Service 1430, 2335).

1. AMERICAN PROPAGANDA THEMES: Although the day's fighting in the west was marked by renewed Allied attacks in Alsace, Transocean's commentator Ludwig Sertorius reiterated his thesis that Eisenhower was preparing to launch a large-scale offensive in the northern and central sectors.

The war attacks north of Strasbourg were said to have resulted in penetrations of the German lines east of Blieskastel and around the Moselle River, while farther south the Americans were reported attacking the encirclement of Colmar.

Residents of Berlin were pictured making last-minute preparations for the impending siege of the capital. As Soviet troops continued to advance westward, Sertorius reported rising in the streets of Berlin and the battle cry of the day seemed to be: "Berlin is ready to fight."

Domestic reports on the fighting in the east stated that the Russians had not made any significant advances during the past 24 hours. There was only brief mention of the Soviet spearheads on the Oder at Frankfurt and Weyern.

Western Front: Despite the intensification of Allied attacks in Alsace, Transocean's military commentator Ludwig Sertorius stated that developments in the south were only of secondary importance and for the fourth consecutive day insisted that a new large-scale Allied offensive would be launched shortly in the northern and central sectors.

Regarding the bulk of Blieskastel's forces was concentrated in the areas around Aachen, Sertorius said the outlines of the new drive facing out north and south of the city were already discernible. "This offensive has by no means started in full," he explained, "but it has been unmistakably announced by the British attack on the Lower Rhine and pressure on the Saar in the left wing of the American first army."

An operational silence seemed to be climaxd on activities in the west, as transmissions offered few details. The communique, presenting a representative report, said: "On both sides of Moselour, our divisions are engaged in heavy defensive battles against American forces attacking with undiminished strength.
In the sector east of St. Vith, heavy battles continue in the forward area of our western fortifications" (German communique).

The renewed Allied attacks in Alsace, after a week's lull, were attributed by Sertorius to reinforecement of the armies of Generals Patch and De Thieraye. He emphasized that the reinforcements were drawn either from the German front or from troops newly arrived from the States.

Sertorius admitted small penetrations into the German lines west of Blieskastel and in the sector north of Lower Alsace, while south of Strasbourg in Upper Alsace strong Allied pressure was reported against the German salient.
"Between Aachen and the Colmar Front the Allies are trying to break through at some points in the line and to split up the lengthy German bridgehead position," Sertorius stated. "The tendency of tactically encircling the town of Colmar from the north and east is outlining itself more clearly." Further south, the French were said to be attacking in undiminished strength in the sector of Thann, Boufendin and Selhouns (Transocean news 1800).

Allied losses in ground fighting since 16 December were placed at 100,000 dead and wounded and 25,430 prisoners, in addition to 1,981 tanks and 147 planes. The toll of planes, including losses in air battles and as the result of Luftwaffe shelling, was said to be 1,218 (US War Home Service 1700).

Increased Allied air blows were reported against the cities of Nurnburg, Munich, Darmstadt, Greif, Mainz and Berlin. Air raids were said to have cost the Anglo-American 1,380 planes, mostly four-engined bombers, during January (Transocean news 1800, 1902; German comunique).
b. German Home Front: With the Soviet armies advancing unchallenged toward Berlin, residents of the capital were described making last-minute preparations for the impending siege.

In the midday "Review of the Situation," Wilfred von Oven declared: "Barricades are going up all over the city. Men of Volkssturm battalions are marching through the streets, men who only a few days ago were peaceful citizens of the Reich. . . Berlin is ready for battle. Berlin is ready to fight."

Picturing the Russian drive in the form of an extended wedge, with its arrow pointed toward Berlin, von Oven acknowledged that measures to halt the advance at the apex were still "in the stage of improvisation." But he counted on the "unconditional will of resistance" of the German soldier, the Volkssturm and every citizen of Germany to inflict damage on the Soviet armies and eventually to master the crisis.

Stories of the brave defense of Kuestrin were cited as encouragement to the people of Berlin. It was pointed out that the massive, frightful Soviet tank is not invincible, and courageous men must not hesitate to come to grips with it. Whoever runs away is lost, and drags others with him," asserted von Oven.

The insistence of Anglo-American prisoners-of-war in camps located in the path of the Soviet advance to be evacuated with German civilians was taken by von Oven as proof that these soldiers have understood the Jewish-Bolshevist danger against which Germany is fighting. They were said to have realized that Germany constitutes the only guarantee of the salvation of Europe (GBS 1235).

Further reductions in the over-all food ration because of the loss of agricultural areas in the east were announced by Berlin. The new rationing system, which will not be published in Germany's newspapers until Sunday, calls for an extension of one week on present food coupons. This means that new allowances will not be available until 11 March instead of 4 March.

In addition to the general reduction, called an "adjustment" in DKB transmissions for the domestic press, the distribution of all starch products except potatoes was curbed for March and April and sugary allowances for March and April were extended through May.

In explanation of the rationing changes, it was asserted that some of the areas taken by the Russians "include farmland from which all of the Reich had been supplied." At the same time, hundreds of thousands of persons who produced food for the Reich had become refugees in the heart of Germany, so that even now be fed on reduced supplies. "This development can be not only by cutting down on everything," it was stated, "each one of us must give up some of his rations so that everyone can be fed" (DNB Bell Home Service 1100, 1400, 1900).

Anticipating a new capitulation appeal from the Big Three conference, Berlin commentators urged the German people to ignore any "Jewish-Soviet people" comparable to Versailles and not to yield because of "sweet promises." They will tell us it would be better for Germany to cease fighting, the commentators said, but we shall recall the humiliation plans of Versailles, Versailles and harmburg. We don't wish to become the prey of Bolshevism and the "bloodsucking" Führer in the German vocabulary (DNB Bell Home Service 1100, 1400).

A dispatch from Stockholm described the dangerous implications to Roosevelt's prestige if the Senate failed to approve the nomination of Harry Wallace as Secretary of Commerce. It was suggested that this brake between the President and Congress would make it difficult for Roosevelt to win needed support for "other treaties planned during this term" (DNB Bell Home Service 1130).

e. Eastern Front: With the exception of one commentator, no German transmissions made mention of the Soviet overtures at Frankfurt and Kuestrin, both pointing to Berlin. The German communique, which is read to the home audience every day at 1000, omitted this sector entirely.

Transcript's Karl Blumenau, in describing the entire eastern front, said that the "Soviet reheasals" had made no marked progress in the last 24 hours. He shuffled out two sectors as being the focal points for coming battles: the Oder-March attack, and Berlin. He indicated that Zhukov had brought up strong forces in the Oder-March area directly up to the Oder itself, on both sides of Frankfurt and northwest of Kuestrin, and had launched an attack already at Kuestrin (Transcript Service 1214).

Later in the day, Alfred von Othmar, also of Transcript, suggested that no important changes had taken place since the previous day at most of the heavily contested focal points. He placed great emphasis on the "assuming defense" of the two towns of Schneidemühl and Kuestrin. Other transmissions also played heavily on these two focal points, one report to the home press admitting that Soviet
The battles in Silesia came in for considerable attention, but only because all transmissions agreed that the severity of the fighting had subdued even the strident German resistance. The sectors indicated were: between the High Tatra and the Oder near Gomulin; south of Bratislava; north of Bitterbich, and on both sides of Steinau (DII Hall Home Service 2015; Transocean Horse 1225; German Counter). In fact, the British Home Service 2015; Transocean Horse 1225; German Counter), in fact, the British had not been able to...
February as planned, a press transmission observed, because new differences of opinion had arisen concerning the DNB delegation (DNB Hull Home Service 1523).

Pacific Front: Japanese Imperial Headquarters released the latest figures on American casualties on Luzon, which, according to a German transmission to the home press, totaled 11,000 men dead and wounded, 114 tanks captured and destroyed. Since the last Japanese report on 22 January, American losses were said to have been doubled (DNB Hull Home Service 1510; GHS 2200). Fighting of a local character only was reported from the northern front on Luzon, while in the south, American advanced troops were said to have reached San Fernando, 42 miles from Manila. New American landings took place in Subic Bay on 30 January, it was added (DNB Hull Home Service 1510).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: As the imminence of a large-scale Allied attack in the west once again was stressed in German transmissions, it was pointed out that concentrated blows have been launched in the Schleiden sector only to draw German forces to this area and thereby open the way for the coming offensive along the Roer farther north.

New Allied gains were acknowledged at the foothills of the Snow Eifel, and on the southern wing, in the region north of Malhouse.

The suggestion that many Germans are wavering in their determination to resist could be detected in Dr. Scharipling's evening commentary. He admitted that there are some persons, "to whom the present battle already appears senseless," and as though answering the questions arising in their minds, he exclaimed, "Is there anybody in Germany who has gone hungry so far?"

Emphasizing that no important changes had taken place on the eastern front, reports placed the focal points on both sides of Breg in Upper Silesia; at Frankfort and Euestrin in the central sector; and around Deutsch-Krone, where the Russians are driving toward Ploesti.

   a. Western Front: The strong Allied attacks in the Schleiden area east of Monschau were viewed in German reports as an attempt to draw German forces to this sector and thus open the way for a successful large-scale offensive farther north at the Roer.

   It was acknowledged that Anglo-American attacks which were launched in the Monschau area on Friday had already made considerable gains to the east. One dispatch said a major penetration had been achieved.

   The communiqué stated that the allies were stopped in the Urft Valley area near Schleiden, but that further south they had succeeded in penetrating German strong points in the southwestern foothills of the Snow Eifel (German comque; GHS 2220; DNB Hall Home Service 2200; 005 0845).

   On the Roer front, where the drive is expected, the High Command spokesperson noted continued artillery fire by the British 21st Army Group and the American Ninth army, from positions east of Kijmegen and near Juelich and Puoren (Transocean Kores 1547).

   Reports on the fighting in Alsace likewise suggested the imminence of the offensive, stating that Allied pressure was being increased so that immediate objectives could be won and large forces freed "for other tasks.

   The Germans on the southern wing were said to have retreated at several points, but to have avoiced a breakthrough.

   Single penetrations were claimed held at the Mosel River and west of Hagenau in Lower Alsace. To the south, between Colmar and Sou-B鄠erach, new Allied forces were reported thrown into battle, but it was said they had not made any significant gains. North of Malhouse, however, the reported Allied attacks admittedly broke through at several points, pushing German positions back to the Nennabruch Forest and forcing them to the defensive between Ensisheim and Soultz (Transocean Kores 1592; German comque; GHS 1930; DNB Hall Home Service 2000; 2200).

   German submarines operating in the waters near England were said to have torpedoes seven vessels, sinking three freighters and an escort vessel and probably sinking a troop transport.

   In the air war, British bombers were reported to have raided Bonn and Godesburg. During January, German fighters and anti-aircraft batteries were credited with the destruction of 1,389 Anglo-American aircraft, most of them four-engined bombers (German comque).
by Norman Home Front: In an effort to stimulate the waning strength of German resistance, Dr. Scherping last night urged persons who were weakening to follow the example of the millions who had shown unflagging determination in the face of enormous suffering.

Indirectly acknowledging a new trend toward capitulation within the Reich, Dr. Scherping said: "There are undoubtedly some to whom the present battle appears senseless. They should not let themselves be dragged along by the doubters, but should follow the firm step of those who are determined."

As it to answer questions arising in the minds of the people, Dr. Scherping pointed out that despite dislocations of communications caused by Allied air raids, the Reich has managed to continue supplying troops and civilians near the front lines. "And is there anybody in Germany who has gone hungry so far?" he exclaimed. "Well, I ask you, hand on your heart, did anyone of you ever go hungry?"

The "quiet heroism" of the German people which has marked their resistance to allied attacks has been exemplified "hour by hour and day by day." In recent weeks, Dr. Scherping stated. citing heroic deeds which could serve as symbols for the entire nation, he mentioned a soldier on furlough who voluntarily turned back to the front to aid his company; a mother who evacuated with her babies and cared for them along the roads to the west; a vehicle operator who drove through dangerous zones to take supplies to the front.

Dr. Scherping commented that German people once considered that terrible enemy bombings were the most they could be expected to bear, but that now they had learned to experience "new and still more deprivations and sufferings" (GHS 1945).

The new propaganda theme that the Big Three now in conference are seeking to "tie the weapons out of German hands since they were unable to take them militarily" was rejected by Dr. Edwards in the midday "Review of the situation."

The attempt by Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin to "report the Wilson swindle" will fail, Dr. Edwards declared, because the German people realized that the "broken promises" of the Allies meant in 1918. "Every German knows what the Allies intended, and will not be fooled another time," he asserted (GHS 1935).

Other dispatches, insisting that the capitulation appeal would be offered shortly, stated that it would aim to separate the German people from their leaders and to break their resistance by creating disunity. But Germany will not sacrifice the National Socialist ideal which it has fought to establish, they said, and will not yield to a deplorable offer which actually makes brutal plans of emigration (EIB Bull. 1230; GHS 09/00, 1230, 1400).

With reference to the record daylight raid on Berlin Saturday, it was claimed that the Americans directed their blows against the thousands of refugees from the west who were believed to have reached the capital. "Reports from Berlin and the statements of captured American pilots that the attitude of these air criminals," said one dispatch. "They always assume the attacks are directed against our material, but they are actually diabolically planned to murder defenseless civilians" (EIB Bull. 2020; GHS 09/00, 1230, 1400).

In proof of the success of the People's Sacrifice campaign, collection figures to date were offered as follows: 150,000 men's suits; 52,000 overcoats; 200,000 women's outfits; and many thousands of old uniforms, shoes, blankets and clothes. New appeals are made for rabbit skins and any type of fur (EIB Bull. 01/01; GHS 1350).

The German D.I. Services, which have transmitted arduously since the Saturday raid on Berlin, once again offered a minimum of material, repeated the same items several times and presented dispatches in English as well as German. The quantity of dispatches from the transatlantic agency was likewise still below normal.

c. Eastern Front: The situation on the eastern frontenden according to the Berlin Military Committee was characterized by three Soviet attacks: one both sides of Oder in Upper Silesia; at Breslau and Kustrin; and in southern Pomera- nia before Bydgoszcz, Danzig-Krono, and Jastrow. Along the entire Oder front, fighting has been said to have continued into Monday between the bridgeheads on both sides of the river. With regard to all sectors of the eastern front, every German report contained the phrase, "no important change in the situation took place."

Although German reports continued to pour in, as they have since the start of the Soviet offensive, the majority of them agreed on the whole, without deviating too much attention to any one sector. The general picture drawn of the fronts was briefly as follows:

Army has concentrated very strong infantry and tank formations in upper Silesia, which opened up an attack on both sides of Oder from the other bridgeheads. No details as yet known. Koley's strategy is not too apparent; he will either go northward to Breslau, or continue west.
Zhukov's spearheads at Frankfurt and Kuestrin were intensified. The Soviets succeeded in reducing the German bridgehead on the east bank of the Oder outside Frankfurt and gaining ground in the direction of the city. In the area of Kuestrin the Soviets achieved some penetrations and heavy battles are now in progress. (Front reports programmed a brief broadcast from Kuestrin, throughout which artillery fire was clearly audible. The broadcast described the sinking of Soviet tank which had tried to cross the Oder, but had broken through the ice in the process).

Near Soviet pressure was directed against southern Pomorania, between Pyritz and northeast of Jastrow, with local penetrations. Schneidemisch and Pozen are still defended by the German garrisons. Pozen is the scene of house-to-house fighting. The German garrison at Billing was pushed back to the edge of town, while at Vierzung, the Soviets were successfully brought to a halt. Southwest of Koeln-Kuestrin, German forces reestablished the temporarily lost land connection to the forces, as Soviet troops failed to achieve a breakthrough on both sides of the city.

This brief summary of the fighting on all sectors of the Soviet offensive was repeated by transmissions through the entire day, and found little elaboration in the reports of correspondents such as Karl Blucher of Transocean (GHS 1930, 2000, 2200; Transocean Horse 1502, 1635, 1640, 1653; DNB Hall 1343, 1347, 1352; DNB Hall Home Service 2200; German comp).

German attacks in Hungary, particularly north of Stuhleichweissenburg, were said to have been "completely successful," and to have reached the road from Stuhleichweissenburg to Cenelli on a wide front. The garrison at Budapest was given relief by German fighters and bombers, it was claimed (DNB Hall Home Service 2200; German comp).

Other transmissions connected with the Soviet threat to Germany in the east quoted Frederick the Great - "On an ordinary day, no disaster is permanent" - as a reminder of previous crises in German history; described the heroism of Wehrmacht and Volkssturm units fighting at the front; praised the effectiveness of the Panzerforce (Botschaft), and quoted the Russian military correspondent Czvrlak as saying that the German East Wall on the Oder was stronger than any German fortification in the west (GHS 1830, 1900; Transocean Horse 6220).

d. Italian Front: The fighting on the Italian front was completely omitted from all German reports.

The U.S. war reporter, Winston Burdett, was quoted in press transmissions as having killed German strategy in Italy a "masterpiece of defensive warfare." Kesselring's forces had clung to their positions across the Apennines and along the southern border of the Po plain, but had also "hit hard" at the same time, Burdett was reported to have said (DNB Hall Home Service 2025).

e. Political Front: Commenting on the invitation extended by Stalin to the delegation headed by the Duke of Buckingham to visit the Soviet Union, a European press transmission pointed out that the Kremlin had adopted new tactics towards England. It wasn't until Churchill had clearly demonstrated his support of Stalin that the invitation was made, it was said, "...the British will see only what the Bolshevik leaders think they should see, Stalin will show them only the surmise phrases of his rule, and of course, the British will be told in praise." The Daily Express correspondent Wooster was quoted as being vehement concerning the fact that Anglo-American correspondents were still not permitted to visit the Russian front and publish reports (DNB Hall 1015).

The Daily Times was cited as pointing out that the U.S. was trying to out-maneuver Great Britain politically and economically. This was allegedly concluded from the fact that England had to refuse Soviet requests for a long term 750,000,000 pound loan, which was extended to extend to the Russians (602 0025).

f. Western Front: Berlin continued to attack what it termed the "wretched trenches" given by the allies to the liberated countries. German, home, forces and press broadcasts dwelt at length on quotations from Allied sources. Major General McDonald was reported to have said that the degree of misery reached by the French and Belgians was very low, and that they had lost confidence in the Anglo-Americans. The French embassy in the U.S. was said to have complained that whereas the Germans had kept French industry busy, the allies were not able to do the same (602 0025; DSB 1100).

An old Nazi propaganda slogan, resurrected from the 1490 French campaign, was changed slightly and applied to the fact that the U.S. had equipped eight French divisions. This was done, Berlin claimed, for the purpose of voice them out. "The Allies intend to fight to the last Frenchman" (GHS 1930).
The Yorkshire Post was quoted as predicting the probable collapse of the Floryt government in Belgium this week as the result of attacks launched on the prime minister by political opponents with respect to the food situation. If a new cabinet were formed, the paper continued, it might be expected that a stronger representation of former resistance forces would result (DNB Holl Home Service 1406).

6. Western Europe: Broadcasts to the home audience and press emphasized the Polish situation with recent on the political and economic phases. The resistance of the Polish farmers to the "notorious land-robbing methods of the Bolsheviks" was said to have increased to such an extent that even the Soviet press had to make relevant admissions. Pravda was reported to have announced the assassination of "several dozen" Soviet commissars, including three members of the Lublin Committee, in consequence of the farmers' resistance to the liquidation of their farms (GHS 2000).

A new internal crisis in the Polish Government in &x was reportedly spoken of in the Sunday Times, with the decision of the Christian-Democrats to withdraw their two representatives in the Cabinet. Thus, Berlin concluded, the Amtzowski government could hardly still claim to be a coalition of Polish forces (DNB Holl Home Service 1406).

7. Southeastern Europe: New riots and clashes between the Plastiras Government and the EAM were reported in several transmissions as the discussions between the two groups were said to have been discontinued due to differences of opinion. The announcement that General Plastiras had taken sick was interpreted by Berlin as indicating that both factions wanted some time to consider the decisions made during the first two days of negotiations.

The postponement of the execution of five members of EAM held by the Plastiras Government was seen as a move on the prime minister's part to use these death sentences "for bargaining purposes" (GHS 2000, 2200; DNB Holl Home Service 1215, 1705).

Quotations from the London Times were used in German reports concerning the "theatrical trials" held in Sofia by Soviet "blood tribunals." The death sentences pronounced on over 100 "influential representatives of the Bulgarian people" were said to be but a weak expression of the mass murders committed by the Soviets (DNB Holl Home Service 1700).

1. Pacific Front: American entry into &xile was freely admitted by Japanese Imperial Headquarters in the &xile radio described the house-to-house fighting in the northern section of the city. The Americans were also attempting to drive into the city from the south, where they had reinforced their land and sea forces in the province of Leyte. (An earlier overseas press transmission had announced the landing on Saturday of a regiment of American paratroopers in southern Luzon). During the first 24 hours of the fighting in &xile, the Americans were said to have lost 1,600 men (GHS 1600, 2000, 2200; DNB Holl Home Service 1650; Transocean News 1220).

Broadcasting to the "heathen," the German radio gave the following report: "Japanese aircraft production has increased 30%. This is largely due to volunteer labor. The government plans to extend this system" (GHS 1100).

EMENY BROADCAST PROPAGANDA, TRENDS AND ANALYSIS
Covering Broadcasts From 0001 8 February to 0001 7 February
(Prepared by P & FW Detachment)

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: The suggestion that Germany might accept peace terms other than unconditional surrender was made last night by the High Command through its spokesman Lt. Gen. Kurt Dittmar.

The insistence of the Allies on unconditional surrender was prolonging the war, said Dittmar, since it left no alternative for the German people. The terms for capitulation now were no better than those that would be offered if the war were continued, and in both cases would involve a program of ruthless annihilation, he explained.

Zero hour on the west front was reported almost at hand. Eisenhower was said to have concentrated strong infantry formations behind the Meuse River in the Aachen sector, and it was believed that his first objectives in the new offensive would be the cities of Cologne and Dusseldorf.

In the east, German counter-measures were claimed producing their first effect, tearing gaps in Soviet assault columns. At the same time, however, it was acknowledged that the Russians still held the initiative in some sectors and that they had established several bridgeheads across the Oder.

2. ENEMY NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:
   a. GERMANY MIGHT CONSIDER PEACE TERMS: DITTMAR
   b. ZERO HOUR APP OACHING ON WESTERN FRONT
   c. GERMANS HAVE HEAVILY BOMBED EAST FRONT
   d. ALLIES UNABLE TO GOVERN ITALY
   e. ONLY STALIN AND ROOSEVELT IN AT CONFERENCE
   f. ANGLO-AMERICANS MADE EMPTY PROMISES
   g. MOSCOW FORCES S.U.L. STATES TO LUBLIN
   h. GERMANY HAS NO MILITARY IMPORTANCE

   a. German Home Front: Lt. Gen. Kurt Dittmar, who speaks on behalf of the German High Command, indicated for the first time last night that Germany would accept peace terms from the Allies -- if these terms represented something less than the unconditional surrender that would mean suicide for the German people.

   The present insistence of the Allies on unconditional surrender leaves no alternative for the German people, Dittmar explained. Whether they yield now or continue the war, they are destined to fall victim to the ruthless Allied will for annihilation.

   This failure on the part of the Allies to leave some alternative, to offer better terms for capitulation now than if the war were carried on, is the reason why the war is continuing, stated Dittmar. "It is not those who fight to the end who prolong the war, but those who aim at a peace like that," he declared.

   War under these conditions, Dittmar continued, is senseless, for the usual aim in warfare is to apply such pressure on the enemy that he is willing to accept your terms rather than bear the continued assault.

   "But in this struggle," he said, "the Allies by their determination to accomplish in victory the annihilation of the German people make it impossible for Germany to yield."

   "Faced with the prospect of such a peace, it is better to continue fighting until the last. Indeed, fighting is almost a relief, for nothing is worse than the passive suffering that such a peace would involve. It would be better to fight on even if the outcome were hopeless, for it is better to meet a terrible end than to suffer terror without end."

   Speaking to show that the very attempts of the Allies to induce Germany to surrender suggest that the situation is not hopeless, Dittmar nevertheless went on to acknowledge that the capitulation appeal might be made only to lessen the price that the Allies would suffer if the war were continued.

   Repeating the words of Frederick the Great, "We are standing along a narrow path with the abyss yarning for us on both sides," Dittmar painted a dismal picture of conditions within Germany. He spoke of the misery of the refugees, the heavy burden of war, the suffering of those subjected to the Allied bombing terror, mentioned the weaknesses of the German army against a superior enemy, the moral suicide of fighting on one's own soil, and at one point referred to ineptitudes of military staff with the statement: "Once the staff work appears to break that has a particularly strong influence on the troops."
After appealing for a revival of the "daring actions which characterized German warfare" in the early part of the struggle, Dittmar admitted that the German army could only hope now to carry out quick, lightning-like thrusts which would hurt the enemy, but which could never be expected to destroy him.

Dittmar acknowledged that recent events had proved with clarity the difficulties of the German position on the eastern and western fronts. Discussing the operational picture in the east, he described every Oder bridgehead as a "fostering sore in our front" and warned of the impending "fateful blows" which are part of the "far-flung Soviet plan."

"Turning to the metaphor of the abyss "yawning for us on both sides of the road," Dittmar said: "No one would like to tread along such a path indefinitely. On the other hand, no one can ask us to give up our balancing rod of our own accord and thus throw ourselves into the abyss of capitulations." (GHS 1945).

In the midday "Review of the Situation," Dr. Otto Kieck likewise insisted that Germany would not capitulate to an unconditional surrender appeal. He offered as his reasons the frequently-repeated line that Germany had been deceived by Wilson in 1918 and would not be fooled again and that other nations which have succumbed in this war have found only Bolshevism or starvation.

German unity has been our strongest weapon in the battle for existence against the "Dangel flood from the east and the plutocratic Jewish invasion from the west," said Dr. Kieck, and therefore the Allies are attempting now to attack that unity as embodied in the National Socialist movement to force our capitulation. But if Germany retains its unity and refuses to yield, then the Allies will find we cannot be beaten, he asserted.

This theme, emphasized in numerous other dispatches, seemed embodied in a statement from Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung: "Empty promises are no longer of interest to us since 1918. In short, whoever wants to tell the German people something must do so through our Fuehrer, Adolf Hitler." (DHS Roll 0826, 1945; DWB Roll Home Service 1230; GHS 1700, 2200; GFS 1100). The penalty for Nazi leaders who weaken in the face of the onslaught and turn against the Reich was disclosed in a domestic broadcast, which said that "disloyal and dishonorable officials" in Berlin had been sentenced to death or placed in punitive battalions by order of SS Reichsfuehrer Himmler (GHS 2000).

b. Western Front. With Eisenhower’s preparations completed along the Roer river front, the zero hour for the large-scale Allied offensive in the west is now almost at hand, according to a Berlin broadcast to the German forces.

This contention was supported in other transmissions, which disclosed that strong infantry formations from other sectors as well as all available reserves had been concentrated behind the Roer in the Aachen area. It was predicted that in view of past failures at the Meuse Eisenhower would seek a decisive breakthrough across the Roer, with his first objectives the capture of Cologne and Andernach.

As a tip-off to the imminent of the expected blow, one dispatch mentioned that several American artillery regiments were already engaged in range-finding east and southeast of Aachen, while the communiqué said the Anglo-Americans were continuing their reconnaissance activity on the entire Roer front.

The high German spokesman pointed out that the western offensive could not be long delayed, because "it is Eisenhower’s intention to have his push coincide with that of the Soviets." He did not view the present fighting at the Roer Mael and in the upper Moselle as the first stage of the drive, however, but only as an attempt to gain favorable jumping-off positions (DHB Roll 1030; GFS 1000; Transcom 1945 1513; German copy).

Transcom’s Walter Plottc, after making a similar reference to the concentration of fresh assault divisions in the Roer sector, reported new American penetrations into the pillbox positions of the West Wall at the Roer Mael. In the West Valley area sector, he said, German counterattacks had inflicted severe losses on the Americans in men and material.

The communiqué added that several Allied attacks were reported around Schoden, that the Americans had made local advances south of the Ourthe Valley and that fierce fighting was taking place near pillboxes east of St. Vith.

On the southern wing, the Americans continued their attacks on both sides of Neuf-Brisach, pushing toward the town from positions east of the Chino-Namur Canal, Plotc reported. Attempts to advance southeast of Colmar and to take the "hotly contested" village of Appenweiler were unsuccessful, he said, while very serious fighting developed north of Mulhouse in the Soultz-Reischau sector.
German formations northwest of the I11 "fought their way back across the river," according to the communique, "and Allied forces were unable to interfere with their disengaging movements" (German communique, Transocean News 1312).

Eastern Front: German counter-measures in the east are beginning to be effective along the whole front, according to a dispatch by Major Ritter von Sohmam. The Soviets, he said, still have the initiative and in some sectors ground would have to be given up because of deep Soviet penetrations, but German air and ground defense had torn deep gaps in the assault columns, especially in the tank units. The strategic main goal of the Russians was defeated, the commander claimed, because the German army was not destroyed in the east, even though the former front was torn up. The Soviets also failed to move forward continuously and to break up organized resistance, he said.

Three factors used up Soviet assault strength, von Sohmam declared. He said that East Prussia had proved to be a united bastion destroying large parts of the immense Soviet forces. The second successful German tactic was the policy of leaving strong units behind Soviet lines which later fought their way back to the front. Finally, there was the great resistance of units fighting around Gremow and in Upper Silisia. Thanks to these measures, von Sohmam said, the German Command was able to build up a new front piece by piece.

This does not mean Soviet attacks will cease, he admitted, but it does mean that time had been thus gained, and time works for Germany (IBS News 1519).

Earl Buescher said in a press transmission that the battle combined with unabated violence, and that the Soviets had not made much headway in any sector. All domestic broadcasts mentioned that both sides had brought up reinforcements, but that there had been no change in the general situation.

The battle in Silisia is rapidly becoming the battle of the Oder, and many Soviet bridgeheads have been liquidated, voice transmissions reported. They said the Oder River was thawing and that the Soviets had been forced to use pontoon bridges after the loss of many bridges under watered ice. The Soviets extended their bridgehead southwest of Breslau, the communique admitted. Fighting around Breslau was said to have improved for the Germans who had recaptured the sullents of Jena-Otterberg and Wasserburg, the main Soviet base for assault on the city (GES 1400, 1430, 2200).

Transocean reported that numerous Soviet bridgeheads on the western bank of the Oder had been reduced by German counterattacks. Although other Soviet bridgeheads were tolerated, furious fighting was described about Kuesmin and Frankfurt. Near Posen the Russians were admitted to have established two small bridgeheads, and south of Kuesmin the Germans claimed to have liquidated another (Transocean News 1524). Hugo Moraro reported on a late voice broadcast that a bridgehead north of Kuesmin had been narrowed (GES 2000). The German communique admitted that the Russians had broken into the center of Pozen.

In East Prussia, the Germans were said to be fighting a terrifying superiority in men and materiel. Great Soviet attacks were reported from the regions of Holzberg, Hermsdorf, and Krussberg. Ailing was said to be the center of fiercer fighting than ever before, and tanks were said in a late voice transmission to have reestablished the link between Konigsberg and the east (GES 1400, 2200).

All dispatches spoke of the success individual fighters and small units were having against tanks. The fighting at Budagast and Lake Belaton was used primarily to illustrate these tactics, and the Soviets were said to have lost the equipment for seven tank corps and one tank brigade. More than two thousand tanks were reported to have been annihilated in Silisia alone during the past 25 days. Particularly successful were the Volksturm and their small anti-tank weapons, the reports claimed (GES 1430, 1100, 2200).

Italian Front: The German communique said that in Central Italy German troops had recaptured recently lost positions in the Apennine Valley near Galliano. Allied reconnaissance thrusts south of Pescara were said to be unsuccessful.

Voice transmissions reported German as stating that the Italian nationalist conditions gave the Allies full control of all southern Italy, but did not contain any promise for the territorial integrity of Italy (GES 1400).

Voice sources were said to report that the cost of living had doubled, and the crime wave was rising rapidly (GES 0900).

Political Front: Churchill was reported to be meeting two partners holding all the trump cards at the three-power conference, and the French press was declared to be full of complaints because France was not invited.
The Tribune was reported to have said that England could only lose from the conference because Churchill’s partners hold all the trump cards of the game. GFS reported that the Evening Standard had a story which speculated that in the next hundred years there would be only two great powers. One of them would be the Soviet Union, and the other would be an English-speaking power dominated by the United States (DNB Roll 1018).

DNB said the French press was complaining because France was left out of the conference. Resistance was reported as saying that the problems could not be solved by a balance of power, or by new spheres of influence (DNB Roll 1114).

1. Western Europe. Voice transmissions reported frequently that the Anglo-Americans had made many promises to France which they didn’t keep. British newspapers were used to substantiate the stories of misery in France and Belgium.

Observer was said to have written that France had reached the limit of hunger and the Headmaster Guardian was the source for reports that unless something was done about the misery in France serious political repercussions would follow (GHS 0900, 1400, GPS 1000). The French press was said to be attacking De Gaulle for promising more troops to the Allies without seeing about food and other necessities (GOS 0015).

2. Eastern Europe. The small states are following Moscow’s example by recognizing the Lublin Provisional Government, according to voice transmissions. DNB said that Bulgaria had already recognized the government, and that Jugoslavia, Roumania, and Norway were expected to follow the policy (DNB Roll 1130; GHS 1230; GPS 1000).

3. Pacific Front. DNB reported from Tokyo that Japanese newspapers are full of the war on Luzon. They know that Manila was reached by American troops, but said that this was of no military importance, DNB said. The newspapers declared that if Manila was taken it wouldn’t mean anything because the nearer American forces get to the city, the better the Japanese position would be (DNB Roll 1339).

Other reports were confused to quoting an “admission” by MacArthur that 17,000 Americans were lost on Leyte (GPS 1100), and that Japanese submarines had sunk one tanker and two transports west of Luzon (GPS 1000).

1. PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Elements of the American Ninth Army were reported to have joined the First and Third Armies in the push against German defense lines in the west. The Ninth's right wing was said to be in action on the fringe of the Eifel Forest before the Saar River, while the First was attacking between Schild- cam and from and the Third continued its efforts to establish bridgeheads across the Oder and Saar Rivers.

A news of extreme pessimism has not weakened Germany's determination to continue the "life or death" struggle, declared Dr. Goebbels in his weekly article in Der Stich. Despite extreme suffering, he said, Germany could not accept a capitulation that would leave it the prey of a "pitiless and vindictive enemy."

In the east, dispatches acknowledged that Soviet troops have widened their bridgesheads across the Oder at Puisttermark, Kostrin and Strecg.

3. WESTERN FRONT: The American Ninth Army has joined the Allied push against the German defensive line in the west, pressing forward in the Eifel Forest sector on the approaches to the Saar River, according to a dispatch by Transocean's military correspondent Ludwig Sertorius.

Only minor forces on the extreme right wing of the Ninth's positions were said to be in action, as the bulk of General Eisenhower's army continued to "pace time." The strong pressure still applied against the west was attributed to the most part to the First and Third Armies.

Sertorius stated that the "expected big Allied thrust against the gate between the Saar and the Eifel Mountains" had still not materialized, and pointed out that meanwhile German positions were being held firmly against Allied assaults along a defense line similar to the Oder River line in the east.

Below the Eifel Forest area, in which part of the Ninth's is deployed, the First Army was reported unable to gain despite strenuous attacks between Schilden and Forbach. Still farther to the south, the Third Army was said to be accomplishing a crossing of the Oder and Lower Saar Rivers, supported by heavy artillery fire. Sertorius claimed that minor bridgeheads established over the rivers had been liquidated (Transocean, horse 162).

The heavy employment of artillery, in this sector as well as all along the front, was called a reminder of the "waste of ammunition during the Third and Fourth Eisenhower offensive east of Lachen" (MDN Home Service 2120).

With reference to fighting on the southern wing, all transmissions acknowledged that German reserves had been withdrawn from the Ill to the sector between Neu-Breisach and mulhouse on the Rhine-Rhone Canal. It was claimed, however, that the entire bridgehead at the Saar between Forbach and Saarburg was again in German hands (German comque: GSI 1700, 2200; GSI 1000; GSI 0846).

Extensive damage to Berlin's cultural centers, including the ancient castle and the opera house at Unter Den Linden, was reported as the result of Saturday's heavy air raids. New air blows were said to have been concentrated against Vienna and Magdeburg. Thirty-three Allied aircraft were reportedly destroyed (German comque; MDN Home Service 2220; Transocean horse 1412).

b. GERMAN HOME FRONT: Warning that present sufferings could not compare to the "dark fate" awaiting a defeated Germany, Dr. Goebbels told the German people in today's Der Stich that the nation's present pessimistic mood would not weaken its determination to continue the "life or death" struggle.

In his weekly editorial, Dr. Goebbels reiterated the High Command's decision not to accept a capitulation offer now because it would throw Germany on the "generosity of a pitiless and vindictive enemy."
Overtones more visible in the article of Lt. Gen. Bittner's piece on Tuesday that Germany could not yield because present terms spell the annihilation of the German people. The most significant statement along those lines was: "Does anyone believe that the German command would ask its people to suffer in such an extent if there were any other way out of the threatening danger?"

Acknowledging that Germany had become "a nation on the defense" with not even the assurance of protection in death, the Propaganda Ministry nevertheless blandly promised that victory would be the reward for suffering and that Germany would emerge from the war "a nation of heroes."

The article served as the touchstone for a new stridency campaign, as he reported that Germany overrun by the Soviet armies in the east had suffered "unpublishable crimes" at the hands of the Bolshevik invaders.

Once again he pictured Germany as the defender of the world against Bolshevism and slavery, and reminded bourgeois Britain and America that they were blind to the danger they faced in the east (DNB Hall 2025).

The theme that a capitulation offer from the Big Three could not be accepted because it would be a repudiation of "Adison's attempt to lie the weapons out of our hands" was picked up again by Rich Blottetsboi in the midday "Review of the Situation."

"In show that behind the moral and humanistic hypocrisy they are hiding the grimacing face of annihilation," he declared (GH 1235).

The announcement from the Roosevelt, Churchill, Stalin conference that plans were being made for a "sweeping peace" drew criticism in a flood of transmissions which mocked the idea of the world's three "war criminals" acting as "angels of peace."

Dr. Dietrich's statement the previous day that an alliance between "plutocracy and Bolshevism would never bring peace to the world," was frequently quoted, with the added comment that a "peace" established by this union would be marked by a constant flight between "dollar imperialism and Bolshevik imperialism," while the rest of the world suffered chaos and hunger (DNB Hall Home Service 1740, 2545; DNB Hall 1830; GIS 1420; Transocean verse 1350).

Atrocities committed by the advancing Soviet armies, including the rape of women and the torture and murder of old men and children, were said to be part of the campaign for the "systematic annihilation" of the German people.

Us:ing the atrocity stories for the obvious purpose of whipping up the determination to resist, one dispatch said: "These barbaric mass murders of German men, women and children which we have seen on German soil make us only more practical in our intention to fight to the last breath" (DNB Hall Home Service 1015, 1480, 2045; DNB Hall 1230; GIS 2000).

Nothing: advantages and disadvantages of the opponents on the eastern front, Schmitz von Bernstorff pointed out that in favor of the Soviets were their long preparation for the drive on Berlin; the speed of their advance through Poland and into Germany; the road not available to them; the new bridgeheads established across the Oder. On the other hand, factors favoring Germany were the long front on which the Russians are forced to divide their forces; the difference of space between German railheads; the cold German control of Posen, the rail center; the front which has bogged down Soviet vehicles in the mud; distance from Soviet supply bases in the Ural s to the front; establishment of a "coherent front line" along most of the front; the deployment of new German detachments; and the bitter German resistance of the defenders.

In a further reference to the punishment of "war criminals who have weakened in their loyalty, von Begg stated: "True, there have unfortunately been quite a few whose minds and hands were not so firm. These men, however, have received their just punishment" (GH 1945).

Stories of frontline horror and grim determination of soldiers in the east flooded domestic broadcasts. In an evening broadcast, "Erwin Kirchst" cited the value of the German "replacement army," in which the principle has been "to put everyone in the right place" (GIS 1830, 1930; DNB Hall Home Service 1650, 1715; GIS 1100).

Eastern Front: Although several German transmissions described the situation between Frankfurt and Warsaw unchanged, Transocean's Karl Blichler produced his dispatch with the statement that "notwithstanding the stubborn German defense, the Soviets were able to expand their bridgeheads on the Oder near Posen and Lusatia."
The focal point of the fighting on the eastern front was placed by Stalin at the central sector of the Oder line, where Zhukov's wedge was said to have been enlarged. No further information was given. However, with respect to the entire Oder front, one transmission to the German press contained the following thinly-veiled suggestion to the German High Command: "This present relative calm in the Soviet advance is a very desirable occasion for the German command to prepare practical defensive and operative measures" (Transocean Horse 1490; D&B Hall Home Service 2120).

Other sectors of the eastern front received the usual attention with much the same comment:

Four Steinem, Gromu and Oduncok fighting was marked by German counter-attacks during which several Soviet positions were taken. At these points, the Soviets were compelled to retreat to the right bank of the Oder.

To the south in the region of the upper Oder, powerful Soviet attacks to the south of Berlin contacted the bridgehead of Cieuzen. At the southeastern tip of Upper Silesia, new fighting activity flared up between the Poles descendants of the former Polish army. Soviet assault regiments were driven against the area between Pless and Bialitz, and later, against Kaylnkas. But the situation remained the same.

In southern Poland, the Soviets increased their pressure in the area of Bydgoszcz and Lomza, but were checked by German formations, although heavy house-to-house fighting was reported in the two towns. At Deutschbronne, German troops encircled strong Soviet formations. The garrisons of Sniadecki and Posen continued to hold out against fierce Soviet attacks.

Southwest of Krakau, Soviet fighting groups which had crossed the Wisula were wiped out. The German garrison of Lublin withstood all attacks.

In East Prussia, the focal point of the fighting was again localized to the Memel-Schlesien-Brandenburg triangle. Only local engagements took place at Konigsberg.

In Poland, the Soviet bridgehead across the Narev, southeast of Lwów, was liquidated (CSS 0840; CBS 1400, 2200; SFS 1600, 2100; D&B Hall Home Service 2120; D&B Hall 1330, 1335; Transocean Horse 1110, 1115; German echo).

Between Oleks Boleston and the Sambo, local engagements were reported, without any change in the situation. The German forces in Budapest were said to have launched an attack which drove into the western section of the city (CBS 2200; German echo).

d. Italian Front: Only one report was received concerning the fighting on the Italian front, and that appeared in the communiqué: "In central Italy, local fighting took place on both sides of the Sorgio River, in the course of which German troops threw the enemy out of their penetration area" (German echo).

Italian troops fighting with the Germans were given special mention in an evening home broadcast, which credited the Italiens with the destruction of seven Allied aircraft reported to have made attacks on northern Italy (CBS 2200).

Further reports were reported to have taken place against the Allied authorities in Sicily, where it was added, the Communist membership totalled 63,000, representing the strongest party in Sicily (D&B Hall Home Service 0956).

e. Political Front: Berlin propagandists continued to attack Allied foreign policy and asserted that the Anglo-Americans were serving as quartermasters for the Soviet troops, which, they said, was necessary in the case of England which had to remain in the good graces of the Soviet Union. It was pointed out that all Soviet occupied countries had swung over to Communism, and were now to be considered members of the Soviet Union, which, it was added, was also the case with many other European countries (D&B Hall 1320).

The Atlantic Charter came in for some attention in German transmissions, with reference to the document as a "figurative bluff" and revealed for what it was worth in the "Polish deception." Quoting from comments in the House of Commons, one transmission played up a Labor Party representative's inquiry as to whether the present Allied interpretation of the Charter did not make the undersigned liars (D&B Hall 2100).

f. Western Europe: The resignation of Prime Minister Pirot of Belgium formed the bulk of reports from Berlin concerning the allied liberated countries, while a late evening broadcast contributed to rumor the possibility that the Dutch Government had also resigned.
Germany reports disagreement to the reasons for Piarlet's resignation, some claiming that he no longer had support from the Parliament, others tracing it to "Bolshevik pressure." But all agreed that the new government would probably be a leftist coalition, headed possibly by the former minister of labor, Van Loker, who was said to be leaning towards a government which included the communists. But one thing was certain, according to Berlin: Churchill's hopes for a western Europe bloc under English influence had been shattered, and Stalin was gradually moving his domain right up to the border of Great Britain (GHS 0900; GFS 2100; LBH Roll Road Service 1900, 2200).

Southeastern Europe: Churchill's policy in Greece was reported to have been criticized severely by members of Parliament, along with the fact that British press representatives in Athens were not given the opportunity to contact ELAS delegates. A Labor Party MP spoke of a "Churchill dictatorship" and accused the government of agitation against the ELAS, it was added (LBH Roll Road Service 2050). Continued clashes in Athens were reported by Reuters, and it was claimed that ELAS ships were acting like "pirate vessels" along the Greek coast and causing trouble for the British Navy which had formed special patrols to cope with them (GHS 1300).

Pacific Front: American forces were admitted to have made gains in Tokyo from the north, but "only a small portion of the troops advancing from the south succeeded in reaching the city." Dowd was quoted by the German radio as announcing that General MacArthur himself was conducting the defense of the Philippine capital, and that fighting was now in progress for Tokyo airfield.

Stating that the Americans had succeeded in gaining a foothold in Tokyo by the employment of airborne forces, Japanese Imperial Headquarters announced at the same time, that the Japanese were holding their positions in the region of Clark Field, where American casualties totaled 7,000. The Philippine Government was said to have transferred its offices to the northern part of Luzon (GHS 1230, 1430; LBH Roll 1465).

Covering Broadcasts from 0001 15 February to 0001 16 February

1. FROM PROPAGANDA, TRENDS: Allied attacking strength was said to have decreased all along the Western Front, and it was noted that progress of the Anglo-American armies could now be measured by a yardstick. The strongest pressure was still being exerted by Canadian and British forces in the Pas-de-Calais area, but they were reported unable to register noteworthy gains.

Dr. Goebbels bluntly told the German people in his article in Der Reich that their one war aim now is to defend their elemental right of existence against any bolt on extermination. Germany would resort to the most desperate means before surrender, he said, because continuation of even a horrible war is better than a peace that would mean death, deportation, hunger and slavery.

With General's armies driving deep into Southern Germany, Berlin commentators pointed out that creating defense lines is no longer enough and that German military commanders would have to find a new solution to stop the Soviet advances.

a. Eastern Front: Allied progress on the Eastern Front could be "measured by a yardstick." As the attacking force decreases in all sectors, reported anhessen's military correspondent Walter Blatt.

The strongest pressure was still being exerted at the northern tip of the front in the Pas-de-Calais area, where Canadian and British forces were said to have launched attacks between Arras, northeast of the forest, and Gennep, southwest of the forest and just west of the Line River. Although some local successes were acknowledged east and south of the forest, it was pointed out that the Allies had not succeeded in breaking open the German fortifications at the Line, and therefore still had not been able to change the "stationary situation" into "mobile warfare."

New German defensive positions were credited with stopping Canadian drives along the roads from Cleve northwest of Emmerich and from 'Evren southwest to St. Lo,' while the British were reported stopped between the forest and the Line and unsuccessful in attempts to widen their bridgehead across the Line River south of Gennep. West German fighter units were reported supporting operations in this sector by attacking Allied supply bases and positions, according to the communiqué.

It was pointed out that Allied forces at the rear still held Allied forces inactive, other dispatches offered additional details on results of the dynamiting of the River's axis. The area between Limburg and Linzich was said to be inundated in most places, and elsewhere covered with deep mud that makes travel almost impossible.

Hill American re-grouping was noted behind the main front, and it was claimed that heavy concentrations in several places had been subjected to heavy German artillery fire.

On the lower River, renewed American attempts to advance north from the bridgehead were reported frustrated. German troops in the "ruins" of Arras were said to be engaged in heavy defensive fighting. With reference to reports on the southern wing, it was announced early that American attempts to advance between Arras and the Rhine had failed (Propaganda cross 1785; German reports GES 0065; GES 0090, 1230, 2200; GES 1000, 1100; BBC World Service 1200).

3. GENERAL PONTI FRONT: Casting aside the usual high-sounding idealistic phrases, Dr. Goebbels bluntly told the German people in today's issue of Der Reich that their one war aim now is to fight on to defend their elemental right of existence.
against an obliterated enemy built on extermination.

"There is no penalty produced by hatred which they do not mean to inflict on us," declared the Chancellor in his weekly editorial. "Every single German would only be able to choose the way in which he would be liquidated in his spiritual, mental and physical life—whether by a shot in the neck, forced deportation to Siberia, hunger, slave labor or pestilence."

Because of this announced Allied policy, said Goebbels, every German knows that the worst war is "still better and more tolerable" than a peace that would be forced on Germany. Although continuing the struggle means that both sides will be bloodied, we are willing to be more ruthless and more radical, in our means towards victory. For Allied threats have taught us that we would not lose any less if we were to surrender. "It would rather result to the next imperialists than after our own hands for the sake of the life of the German people, their children and grandchildren for all times."

Subtly suggesting the possibilities of Allied victory, Goebbels maintained that the world which the Allies wish to bring about is doomed to fail because of its lack of ideals. "If this is not proved today, it will be proved tomorrow," he said.

This world of the future envisaged in Allied propaganda actually would bring only anarchy, bread, lust for vengeance, sexual assault and desire for conquest and power, he asserted, and already the "decadent peoples of Europe" are fulfilling this feet in the hunger, misery and political and economic anarchy which they are being called Allied domination.

"Drifting the superior war potential of the enemy, Goebbels said, bravery under all circumstances is the only thing that can save the German people in their present situation. "The war is not for being forced and hence today can save Germany as that last battle, which is our last chance," he declared (25 May 1918). A pessimistic view of the war situation was taken by Dr. Goebbels in the midday "Review of the Situations," during a discussion of the Yalta conference, he stressed, its importance "now that the military situation looks so favorable for the Allies" and at another point, he cited the dismal prospects for Britain "even if Germany should still win the battle in the west."

Yet after the "occupation" of Poland as a symbol of the steady rise of Stalin to position of "Czar of Europe," Goebbels pointed out that British and American adherence to Russia already was being criticized in the Allied press. "Suspicion is being widely voiced as to the final aims of the Soviet Union," he said.

Allied sources later were quoted by Goebbels to show that in spite of the war "the Allies believe that Germany has not yet reached the end of her strength." The "eyes of Light" on the horizon were said to be the revised strength of the U-boats due to their new devices and the menace of the "Peacelust," the 14-pound breeches being used successfully against Soviet tanks (1918).

For the third consecutive day, transmissions for the domestic press highlighted results of the U.S. conference and went into long dissertations to refer to Allied plans to destroy Germany and to prove that the outcome of the conference is the ascendency of Europe to Bolshevism.

In answer to the "unanswerable threat" of Germany and the desire to crush Germany's economy, industry and leadership, the will of the people was said to be to fight and work to the last. The "Bolshevist" was said to have "closed their mouths, forcing them irresistibly to harrow Europe to Bolshevism's end." Almost mindful that Germany would be left out of terms of the Atlantic Charter reaffirmed at Yalta, one Goebbels said: "Their aim is to drive every people the right to decide on their own fate, but our enemies never intend to give this right to the German nation."

Another Soviet victory was seen in the recent sessions of the London Brede Union Congress, under the auspice of a society of capitalists to restore the "Bolsheviks founded [a] second International to further the world revolutionary aims" (F5 2100; D6 R4-100 Service 20520; 0955, 0850, 1030, 2200, 0200).

And reports of the Bolshevik "blood terror" in Upper Silesia demonstrated murdered of old people, torture of soldiers, and deportations of "slave labor." Statements were quoted from persons who allegedly witnessed the revolts and were deported to the German lines (R4 R4-100 Service 2035).

The destruction of large parts of Dresden to a "heap of rubles" and the destruction of its most beautiful monuments and buildings in recent air raids was viewed as another example of Anglo-Saxon barbarism. In bound air raids of Germany. The airmen were said to be striking the most valuable objects for shipment to the states (F5 2100; D6 R4-100 Service 2035).
of Western Front. Press dispatches reported that eastern front battles, particularly in Lower Silesia, were rendering a new climax of Russian Soviet armies pressed forward to take advantage of fluid conditions.

A D.I. dispatch sought to show that the “Garrison Command is united only for the right moment,” and that in this “complex state of the war it is not only a matter of crossing ordinary new defense lines, but that new solution must be found through operations in large theater.” Military commentators, the dispatch said, agreed that the Russian counterattack would come when the Soviet drive had reached its culmination, and that this point would be brought about by Soviet losses. The report said that already these losses were more than one-third of its artillery and 8,000 tanks (D.I. wire from service 1230).

Transvaal’s assistant said, “Soviet tactics were to surround individual cities, towns, and army groups by “blocking sections of the terrain called rails in the Front.” And then, he said, the Russians intended to develop these smaller envelopments into large packets. Due to the vast Soviet superiority in numbers and matériel they were able to hold considerable ground, but neither, according to L.d.I., had they been able to form the large packet. The Germans always withdrawn in time, after inflicting heavy losses.

In Lower Silesia, assistant reported that German forces had two objectives which were reportedly ordered to take at all costs. The first thrust was said to be aimed at the Bzura sector where��he bridgehead had already crossed the small river north of Bzura, and were already into large forests where infiltration was difficult to prevent. The second Soviet thrust was reported further north in the area of Bzura east of the mouth of the Bzura, strong mining forces crossed the Slovak-German border 16 where fierce fighting was said to be raging. Soviet airplanes were admitted to have pushed north and southwest of Bzura, and into the town of Bzura before German forces attacked there (Transvaal since 1895).

On the central part of the Front, another reported that on both sides of Posen the Germans had surrounded several Soviet bridgeheads, the communists said; these bridgeheads were at Bzura and at Wolfsburg, and that most of these Soviet troops were expelled in several actions.

The main for Posen was reported to be fierce, and consisted of artillery duels and street fighting. Transvaal said, despite Soviet superiority in men and matériel, the German defense system was able to withstand these attacks.

The local point of interest for east Prussia was reported at Rambur, and on the eastern front of alliance Soviet threats were admitted to have penetrated into the main German battlefront vast area of scale. An extremely heavy Soviet tank force was reported in these battles (Transvaal since 1895).

Speaking of Budapest, press dispatches said that when the castle was no longer a goal for tanks, the regiment was ordered to leave and to fight through Soviet lines. Twenty thousand divisions and 1,000 airplanes, the report declared, thus assaulted Soviet objectives and left that with only a pile of rubble. In Budapest, the report stated that Soviet forces did not capture both castle and garrison (D.I. wire from service 2100).

d. Italian Front. The German communiqué reported the capture of prisoners by Alpine troops on the French-Italian frontier. German cars were wiped at a strong point in the mountains south of Alpago. British attack north of Polesine was said to have been halted by defensive fire.

Voice broadcasters voiced the list of hunger and misery in Italy to show that in Polesine Italy the story was different. "Furnaces were said to have been taken by black-shirt troops who had confiscated all food stock and shot black workers (CE 0900)." The Alpago battle was said to be draining millions of all their possessions, and meant was their disappointment in the Allies (CE 0900). In Italy, girls gave themselves to men, and children were forced to beg from American negro troops, they reported (CE 1000).

e. Political Front: D.I. reported from Stockholm that the "sax-ham hounding over Finland & the Poles by Briutah and soviet," had had a strong reaction in the national press, but that the story just hadn’t been told in Allied newspapers. Expression was reported to have said that any Poles would not be better chances of Finnish, even through an important problem had been settled (D.I. wire from service 1115).

The axis War was reported to have said that instead of Fusion of the two governments, the Jewish government had been recognized, expressing its clash main cords earlier that the Polish question had been settled without regard for those nations which had been allies, and for whom Britain had originally entered the war.
Many dispatches said that the American ambassador would not be sent to London, but to Moscow (DNB Hall 1700; GHJ 1200).

The Japanese were reported in voice transmissions to have dismantled the oil installations at Ploesti for transportation to Russia, despite their British and American ownership (GHS 1100; GHJ 1200).

1. Western Europe: The first Belgian cabinet meeting was reported to have been held on November 11 in appeal to the Allies for help during the famine and worst in Belgium. The leader was reported to have said that the western powers must help or the Belgian people would go under, and that promised aid would no longer be sufficient (DNB Hall 1700; GHJ 1700).

Voice broadcasts declared Paris was nothing but a great hospital where diseases were spreading fast. Under the Germans, the Spanish paper El Pueblo said, the Germans saved many Parisians with their medicines (GHS 1700).

2. Pacific Front: The Japanese army which would resist American landings on the north China coast, according totranscripts, could number more than four millions. Plans have been made to resist this attempt since the summer of 1944, and now that the direct rail line has been established, the dispatch said, there would be ample supplies and reinforcements for the Japanese. Minsheu, with its great industrial capacity and immunity from air attack, would be a great reserve. The Japanese were said to expect the landing in the provinces of Fukien and Kwantung (transcripts 705).

Japan was reported to be ready to spend 85 million yen on war in the coming fiscal year. A part of the sum would be raised by the South Seas Development Agency, voice broadcasts said (GHS 1700).

The Potsdam Conference would have no effect on the German people, other then to increase their resistance, according to a spokesman of the Japanese Government (GHS 1700; GHJ 1100).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA THEME: stiffening German resistance was noted all along the western front, as the Allied forces parried for slight territorial gains against concentrated defensive fire. The British-Canadian attack at the northern tip of the front between the Lower Rhine and the Ems was said to have come to a virtual standstill.

In broadcasts to the domestic audience, German commentators expressed their indignation over the ruthless Allied annihilation campaign. Signs of the Allied intention to destroy Germany and the German people were seen in the ruthless Anglo-American air raids; the deliberate reduction of cities in the east by the Soviets; the reported deportation of thousands of German workers to Russia for compulsory labor; and the mass executions of Hungarians in Budapest.

On the eastern front, a new Soviet drive was reported at the southern tip of Finland. It was also acknowledged that the Soviets were thrusting toward Leningrad from Blomberg.

2. BRITISH NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:
   a. GERMAN RESISTS ANGLO-AMERICAN STRIKE ON WEST FRONT
   b. ALLIES CONTINUE THEIR DELIBERATE ANNIHILATION EFFORTS
   c. NEW SCULLY DRIVE AT RHINE AIRED AT DUSSELDORF
   d. ITALY SEEN AS SLAVE OF ALLIES AS RESULT OF Yalta
   e. GPU CONTROLS ALL ACTIVITY AND ELECTIONS IN POLAND

3. AMERICANS LOST 167 PLANEs OVER TOKIO; FIGHTING ON CORRIDOR

4. WESTERN FRONT: German resistance was further stiffened all along the western front during the past 48 hours, as Anglo-American forces parried for slight territorial gains against concentrated defensive fire, according to a dispatch by Transocean's military correspondent Walter Plato.

The report of the First Canadian Army between the Lower Rhine and the Mer was "almost come to a standstill" as a result of German counterattacks, Plato asserted, and the inundations of the flooded Rhine limited British and Canadian offensive action to the Cleve-Cesarea road and the region southeast of Greven. The Canadians noted a new blow carried out by fresh Allied divisions after strong artillery preparation, but claimed the attack was halted at the main battle line.

Reporting extremely heavy Allied losses in the battles at the northern end of the front, a domestic broadcast pointed out that a German unit counted 600 British-Canadian dead on a stretch of the Kilometer near Cleve. It was stated that the Allied intention to break through the German defensive line in the north had been frustrated, and that plans for a simultaneous attack at the coast had to be abandoned because of the dynamiting of the dams.

On the other front, the Americans were said to have pushed forward about 100 meters north and northeast of Kehrenbach in an attempt to widen their bridgehead across the river. German Volksgruppen leaders reportedly recaptured several pillboxes in stubborn fighting east of Tottenin at the Orscholz Bult. On the southern wing, American patrols were claimed repelled at the Helltweter bridgehead, and the attack at the Fies sector were said to have been discontinued as a result of heavy Allied losses (Transocean Horse 1400; German conquest; CBS 2200; B.S. Hell Horse service 1848).

The campaign reported that a strong Allied convoy headed for Larzanak had been attacked by German submarines and torpedo-carrying planes and that 10 transports, two destroyers and one cruiser were sunk. The planes struck first and the Destroyers joined battle when they reached the convoy off the Baltic coast, close to the coasts. (Previous Allied report acknowledged the German attacks, but claimed the convoy got through unscathed).

5. GERMAN HOME FRONT: Declarations of righteous indignation over the ruthless Allied annihilation campaign marked the day's propaganda, as even the two key commentators Hans Fritzsche and Hans Hertel offered little more than condemnations of Soviet executions and deportations and willful Anglo-American "air-gangsterism".

While the reduction of cities in the east and the torture and murder of civilians caught up in the path of the advancing Soviet armies were seen as steps toward establishment of a Bolshevik slave colony in Europe, the Anglo-Americans were accused of sacking German cities merely to create terror. "Those raids are not very impressive at a moment when the Allied claim to be near their victory," said one dispatch. "They prove that the destruction of valuable columns is part of the program to destroy all Europe." (HSI Bull Home Service 0930).

Arriving this time last week that Germany is engaged in a moral battle as well as a struggle for survival, Britische mentioned the terrorist attacks by the Allies against fleeing refugees with the "sympathetic manner" in which Germany cared for foreign refugees in 1940. Despite the invented stories of German atrocities, he asserted, the German people can see in the deliberate attacks against refugees in Berlin, in Breslau and in Gottleben; in the deportation of German workers to Siberia, and the annonces of splitting Germany and exterminating the German people, their moral justification for continuing the battle. It is Germany that is fighting for a righteous cause, he declared.

Britische asserted that instead of discouraging the German people, the knowledge of these "cowardly" war aims and methods would serve only "to call forth the final power of resistance of a gifted and cultured nation." We have never been deprived of our ideals, said Britische, "and we shall never agree that powers which have organized the murder of civilians can win this war." (HSI 1565).

In a "view of the situation" at noon, Hertel quoted stories from the especially high-priced reporting the destruction of thousands of German workers to Siberia for compulsory labor, and from the Swiss Tribune de Genève describing mass executions of Hungarians in Budapest. "After reading these statements and seeing how Bolshevism devours one country after another, we realize that Bolshevism can only be stopped by force," said Hertel. "It is not a matter now of a parley with the enemy, no, it is a matter of fighting till victory." (HSI 1235).

In a good spirit of self-pity and indignation, several domestic broadcasts acknowledged that Germany was going through its "hardest trial" and that the German people were suffering every deprivation on behalf of the Fatherland.

Scenes of evacuation were described, of marches in rain and mud from dawn to nightfall for fourteen days, for the sole purpose of "assisting the clutches of the fanatical Bolshevics."

The same theme was developed by Dr. Franz Ester, who credited the magnificent courage of German women for Germany's ability to withstand repeated blows. She told of the thousands of women in the east who had left home and possessions and fled their relatives to safety and aid their miners who would walk 20 kilometers to work every day even as the soviet armies approached (HSI 1560, 1565).

In explanation of the new military courts established to prevent working by "cowardly elements," it was stated: "When a people of 56,000,000 persons throws everything into the battle for life and liberty against a pitiless and murderous enemy, nobody has the right to sabotage the efforts of others who are doing their utmost for the battle." "This program of court martial is in accordance with the demands of the vast majority of the German people." (HSI 0900; HSI Bull Home Service 0915).

Announcing that private individuals could not expect restoration of their telephone lines when cables are destroyed in a bombing attack, a domestic press dispatch explained the complexity of the underground apparatus and the impossibility of quick repair, since one bomb might have demolished several cables, each containing a thousand or more lines (HSI Bull Home Service 1210).

In a detailed report of Germany's financial situation, Reichsminister of Economic Affairs Walter Funk affirmed that the nation's currency and credit have been organized in such a way that Germany's economy is ready to "withstand all burdens of peace and war." He noted an increase of Germany's currency circulation, bank reserves and savings bank accounts and promised that the Reich Bank could guarantee maintenance of a stable currency (Transocean Morse 1621).

In other dispatches, Harry Hopkins was described as the "Rasputin of the White House," a New York Daily News article was quoted to show that returning wounded had a feeling of "ingratitude" in the states; and figures of People's Sacrifice campaign results were cited to show that increased collections have provided enough equipment for the entire Volksturm (HSI 1160; HSI Bull Home Service 0920, 1940).

In eastern front: German transmissions concerning the fighting on the eastern front showed a marked decrease in number, but those that were received reported the entire situation unchanged.

Transocean's Karl Bless, an our newsman at the southern tip of Siberia north of Novikov, the full of drain in central Siberia, and a heavy Soviet drive from the southern flank to Omsk, since in a report.
Front by front, Blucher reported the following:

Soviet planes preceded a new major attack north of Rostilov by loving strong tank screen, which engaged German forces in a battle still in progress. South of Breslau, Koniev's troops attempted to break through their bridgehead between Strehlen and Kettin. To the north, the Soviets gained ground on both sides of Breslau, and at Szczytno, which finally had to be evacuated. In northern Silesia, Soviet forces at Chrzanow and across the Rother and Vorder Gard were repulsed by Volkssturm units.

Zhukov's most westerly penetration at the Oder and Brunsberg and on the scatter did not engage in any activity. The troop concentrations between Brunsberg and Frankfurt were subjected to heavy German artillery fire. (German High Command reported that Koniev occupied nearest to Zhukov's forces is now at Luchy, which lies 10 miles east of Gotenhau.)

Between the Oder and the Arnsdorfa-Roitz area, heavy offensive and defensive fighting took place.

Sokolovsky's forces continued their assaults on German defense lines between Landsk and Brunsberg. In the forest area of the Tuchol Heath and west of Grudenz, Soviet efforts made deeper penetrations in very difficult terrain. Heavy fighting is now in progress.

In Poznan, the German garrison is defending the center of the city.

The focal points in East Prussia remains the same: south of Bromberg and on both sides of Litsyn. German forces at Werneck and Schlacht hold off superior enemy forces, and the situation is becoming tense. (Stalin's Order of the Day announced the capture of both towns.)

Blucher reported no news from the fronts at Komarn and the westland area (GHS 2230; GHS 2130; Transscaurian-Strasse 1955, 1900, 1900). The communiqué announced Soviet losses in Hungary between Lake Balaton and the Donu, affected by the Schoscht and Hoffen-Strasse between 1 January and 15 February 20: 5,100 prisoners, 2,317 tanks, and 4,317 vehicles. The Luftwaffe was said to have participated in inflicting these losses (GHS 2030). The early morning wireless news broadcast was interrupted throughout by a ghost voice which repeated the instruction, "Lies, all lies, dolce vita lie." At one point, the announcer reported that German forces had penetrated into Monitz. Ghost voice: "Soviet Forces: Now three days ago." (GHS 0865.)

d. Italian Front: German sources continued to maintain silence on the fighting in southern Italy of the communiqué omitted mention of the front for the third consecutive day.

An unidentified American correspondent was quoted as having said that conditions in Allied-occupied Italy were much better under the Germans, "when the people had higher wages and lower food prices." British and American troops stole food, clothes, from military stores and sold them on the black market, it was said. Another transmission suggested that as a result of the Yalta Conference, Italy was clearly seen as the slave of the Allies (GHS 1000, 1400).

e. Eastern Europe: The Yalta Conference's decision concerning the future of Poland under a broader and more lenient treatment was attacked vehemently again by Berlin in communications which emphasized the "great guerrilla" between the London Poles and Krasienski, and western Allies. English circles were trying to force the Poles to agree to Soviet control of Poland, it was said, and were threatening them with withdrawal of recognition by the western powers, and the cutting off of credits. Krasienski was quoted as saying at a press conference that the Polish people did not believe in the Soviet promises, and that every election was a fiction as long as the GPU supervised all operations (GHS 11:1014 Service 1125, 1120, 2100).

Another representative of the London Poles was also quoted as raising a voice against the Yalta conference. General Anders, Commander-in-Chief of the Polish troops fighting with the British Eighth Army in Italy, was reported to have issued a proclamation stating that the results of the meeting were tragic and that Poles would never recognize such a decision and would fight for the real independence of Poland (GHS 0800; DBS Hull Home Service 1125).

f. Pacific Front: Japanese Imperial Headquarters was quoted as saying that a result of the great attack by American carrier-based planes on Tokyo Friday, the Japanese destroyed 147, and damaged 50, themselves losing a total of 81 planes. The American naval unit that authored the attack was described as consisting mainly of ten aircraft carriers. Another wave of planes was reported by the Japanese to have swept over Tokyo on Saturday morning (GHS 1400; DBS Hull Home Service 1255).
American landing attempts on Volcano Island in the Bonin group were said to have been frustrated, with the subsequent loss to the Americans of one battleship, two cruisers, and two other warships (GHS 1930; DBB Home Service 1935).

Successful landings by American troops were said to have been made on Corregidor in Manila Bay on Friday morning, and air borne formations were reported to be taking part in operations in the southern part of the island (GHS 1700; DBB Home Service 1935). Street fighting was still in progress in Manila as most of the city lay in ruins, according to Japanese reports (GHS 1930).

The Tokyo radio made several announcements concerning Japanese troop movements along the 1800 mile long Chinese coast as precautions taken against possible American landings (GHS 1600, 1700).

DAILY BROADCAST PROPAGANDA, TRENDS AND ANALYSIS

Covering Broadcasts from 001 20 February to 001 21 February

(Prepared by P & F M Detachment)

1. THE PROPAGANDA TRENDS: The offensive by the Canadian First Army at the northern tip of the front was believed coming to a stop because of heavy losses. New forces which have just been brought up, including the bulk of the British Second Army, were said to be carrying out recent attacks. Light Allied gains were reconfirmed in the north during the day, and street fighting was reported taking place in the communications center of Gocht. There were no other significant changes on the rest of the front.

Dr. Kurt Dittmar justified the draw-out defense of strato-points behind the Soviet lines even against heavy odds, in view of the necessity for Germany to resort to any means to prevent self-destruction. At this stage of the war, he said, Germany finds it necessary to abandon the military concept of honorable surrender.

Fightings on the east front were concentrated in the sector southeast of Berlin, where American forces were reported advancing toward the capital from the sector of the Sauer, Rhine, and Ruhr Rivers. It was said that the Soviets were fighting in the terms ofruben, Genau, Leibau and Grommen.

★ Eastern Front: Army losses suffered by the Canadian First Army were said to have virtually stopped the attack at the northern tip of the front, and the military correspondent Alex schoffluss observed that Montgomery had already been obliged to bring up the bulk of the British Second Army to support the faltering Canadians.

The results in the northern sector during the past 24 hours were believed carried out by fresh forces that had just reached the front. They moved forward after a five-hour artillery barrage, but were reported checked by concentrated German defensive fires.

It was acknowledged that house-to-house fighting was taking place in the communications center of Eckh, south of the Rummelwald. German Volkssturm units, as well as partisans, were said to be defending valiantly amidst the rubble of the town (GFS 1700, 2200; GFS 0245).

On the remainder of the east front, the communique reported the following developments: The American Third Army made small gains at the border of Northern Luxembourg, but breakthrough attempts were frustrated; American attacks which have been going on for weeks in the Sierich sector increased in intensity; Allied assaults were marshaled in salients; Allied concentrations were subjected to German artillery fire at Forbach; new Allied blows were struck against single localities north of Haguenau.

The communiqué likewise noted renewed American attacks at the northern and eastern sectors of the battle, and claimed the attacks were repulsed with heavy losses (German communique).

In a surprise attack on an Allied convoy returning from Murmansk to England, German torpedo planes were credited with the sinking of two light cruisers, two destroyers and eight merchant ships. Three other vessels were reported damaged (GFS Wall Home Service 2295).

Long-American bombers carried out raids against the town of Husel, just ahead of the Canadian forces, as well as Vienna, Orso and Erfort according to the communiqué.

It was reported on a forces broadcast that American units have been suffering from a lack of junior officers and non-coms since the battle of the Ardennes, and that as a result promotion is now being granted without regard to length or nature of service. Some technical grades are now being used as leaders of frontline troops, the report stated (GFS 1000).
b. German Home Front: Justifying last-ditch defense of strongpoints behind the Soviet lines, Lt. Gen. Kurt Dittmer declared last night that at this stage of the war Germany has found it necessary to abandon the military conception of honorable surrender.

"Formerly," he said, "the question of so-called honorable surrender had to be considered in every case. But the inhumane conduct of war, realized and carried out by our enemies, the will to accomplish the destruction of Germany, which has been proclaimed by the Allies, must make the German nation understand that today such a proposition is beyond consideration."

Giving the heroic resistance at such strongpoints as the Kursk, the Stalingrad, the Dniepr, the Don, and the Volga, Dittmer pointed out that the determination of these garrisons to hold out against heavy odds had proved advantageous in the conduct of the campaign by enabling the German forces to gain time and thereby effect at least partial consolidation of the front.

The principal long-range goals of holding out for prolonged periods, Dittmer explained, were to deprive the enemy of important road and rail junctions, to tie up important Soviet forces; to prevent the enemy from succeeding in a quick breakthrough and to allow time for other German formations to consolidate the right. He admitted that these defensive actions were proving costly in German blood "at a time when Germany is not in a position to squander its forces as the Allies are." But added that the assets of the resistance also outweighed the deprimations and sufferings (GES 1945).

Dr. Otto Krieger cautioned the German people in his "Review of the situation" at noon that all their strength would be required to stem the combined onslaughts of the Soviets and Anglo-Americans on the east and west. Asserting that the primary requisites were to stop the Soviet tide, he reiterated that the alternative was not only destruction of the German nation but also the establishment of a new Bolshevik-dominated system in Europe.

The death and plans of annihilation announced at Yalta were said to have increased Germany's strength and determination to resist, and this new power was found symbolized in the magnificent efforts of young boys and middle-age men in the Volksarmee formations. Systematic bombing of German cities by the Anglo-Americans was believed to be the master of the western powers to Stalin's demand for cooperation in the case murder of the German people.

Deferring once again to Britain's loss of prestige in this war, Krieger said this tendency could already be observed in the declining British influence in the Balkans and the Mediterranean (GES 1235).

Domestic items described the successful fabric collection being made as part of the People's Sacrifice Campaign; the establishment of special centers at railroad stations so that members of the Hitler Youth evacuated from the east could communicate with their families; and the statement from the Berlin paper Ya that although theaters have been closed in Berlin for three months, "life in the capital goes on as usual" (GES Hall Home Service 1365, 1940; GES 1940).

In an effort to show that prisoners of war prefer to remain in German camps rather than fall into Soviet hands, the story was told of four British soldiers who escaped from a camp in the east, hid from the Soviet troops for a week, and when returned behind German lines reported that "We are very glad to be back with German troops" (GES Hall Home Service 1322; GES 1940).

The brief expressions of hatred by a 17-year-old German girl at her courtartial trial were said to have brought the realization to American military authorities that a people whose youth is inspired by such spirit are bound to prove invincible. Erich Scholl, of Munich, a BDM youth movement leader accused of communicating with German soldiers, was reported shot along with several of her comrades. Before that, however, according to an alleged Daily Mail report, she proclaimed the feeling of hatred which the German people have for the American soldiers; assailed the Americans for their cowardly terror attacks on German civilians; and declared that the German people are willing to suffer every deprivation to create a new world order.

Letters written by the girl to her fiancé in the German army, read before the court, were said to have disclosed the conviction that if the German soldiers now had material at their disposal equal to that of the Americans, the strip of territory held by the Americans in the west would be soon be "liberated."

Numerous transmissions emphasized this item, citing the girl's conduct as a symbol of the spirit of the entire German nation today (GES 2000, 2400; GES Hall Home Service 1615, 2130; GES 2100).
Eastern Front: Taking their cue from the military spokesmen of the German High Command who placed the weight of the Soviet offensive in the area between the Bug, Dniepr and Dnestr rivers, German transmissions stressed that Russian forces were fighting fiercely for the town of Ochakow, Leuchtenberg, and Greuten, and were making progress in driving westward.

 dificent. Hellansteden gave a brief summary of the situation on the eastern front which he characterized as Soviet concentration points designed to begin an all-out offensive, announcing that German forces had inflicted heavy losses on the Soviets, he cautioned that the German people would only be deceiving themselves if they believed that the Soviet "elitte formations" had been seriously weakened. On the whole, he said, the German High Command had shown remarkable restraint in not employing its central reserves, yet had succeeded in stabilizing certain sectors. For example, Hellansteden pointed out, German troops had recaptured Sagan, and reestablished connections with Groetz and Sammlendorf (CGS 0845).

Soviet attacks were continued at the southern tip of Galicia between Bielitz and north of Kolberg. Brzezina was attacked from several directions but still remained in German hands.

In the north, the Soviets brought up new infantry and tank reserves and thereby increased their pressure westwards between the Bug, Dniepr, and Dnestr rivers, during the course of which they succeeded in gaining ground. This was done by bypassing German blocking positions. However, the Soviets were stopped by counter-strikes and thrown back in the Schauer region. Heavy fighting flared up again north of Krasnoe. The Oder front between Posen and the Oderbruch continued to remain inactive.

In southern Poland, the focal points remained between Bydgoszcz and Kolberg, where the Soviets continued their attacks, simultaneously, they opened up another attack in the area north of Marklen-Friedland with strong infantry and tank forces.

To the east, the Soviets achieved some gains northwest of Bialystok and northeast of Cracow.

In west Prussia, heavy battles were in progress in the area of Hohenlock. West of Koniggratz, German forces began an attack and interrupted the Soviets' progress for the planned large-scale drive (CGS 1907, 1920; DDE Well Home Service 2206; German comment; Transoceanic Home 0845).

On the Hungarian front, German operations cleared out the southern part of the split Gera bridgehead and scattered the Soviet units, it was claimed. This bridgehead on the Oder, now held by Soviet reserves, was part of the plan for a push into the AustroHungarian plain and on to Vienna, it was explained (CGS Well Home Service 2900; Transoceanic Home 0845).

Illyrian Front: Operational reports on the fighting in Italy were limited to one sentence in the communiqué: "East of Monte Cassine in the central Struma bridgehead, the Allies made countless local attacks throughout the day without appreciable success" (German comment).

The last feature of the German campaign against the alleged enemy's "plundering" of food out of Italy was that the Allies had "plundered" the country of 20,000,000 tons of foodstuffs, which were shipped to England and the U.S. Most of the merchandise was said to consist of sulphur, lemons, wine, salt, vegetables, wood and charcoal. Food for Italy would not be available to Italy until the summer, an Allied station was reported to have said, "Thus, there is no shipping space available for food deliveries to the hungry Italian people," Berlin commented, "but there is sufficient shipping space available to remove the plundered goods" (CGS Well Home Service 1220; CGS 2206).

Political Front: Berlin continued to attack "Bolshevik imperialism" as evidenced by Turkey's opening of the Dardanelles to Allied traffic. The Ankara government now had to face the demoralizing fact, the German radio said, that it had lost the Dardanelles to the Bolsheviks, and thereby sacrificed its independence. The Black Sea which Churchill once called "the private pool of Britain" was now becoming the first base for Bolshevik penetration into the Mediterranean. on land was paying a costly price in this respect, by experiencing the delivery of Bolshevik weapons to the NLC in Greece, it was pointed out (CGS Well Home Service 1230).
2. Western Europe: The Roosevelt-De Gaulle affair was heavily underlined in German Transmissions which adopted the line that Roosevelt had invited the French leader to conspire him for not having been invited to Yalta, and that De Gaulle had declined the invitation for the same reason. The American press was reported to have commented on the event calling the individual who had advised Roosevelt to take the action "the most tactless person alive." Other Allied and neutral newspapers were quoted as saying that De Gaulle had no one to blame but himself. (D.B. Hall Home Service 1635; GOS 0845.)

Borin stated "without fear of exaggeration" that the French Communists had become the chief supporters of De Gaulle, but that no one in France expected "the present illusions" to last much longer than was pleasing to Moscow. In this respect, Maurice Thorez, the Communist leader, was quoted from a speech at Toulouse wherein he intimated that the French Communists were preparing to get rid of the De Gaulle administration (D.B. Hall Home Service 1635; GOS 2000).

Southwestern Europe: Press and radio reports quoted Thorez and side which stated that thanks to British foreign policy, Tito had become sole ruler of Jugoslavia. Thus, in order to consolidate his Bellovnik regime, Borin commented, Tito had instituted courts which were carrying out an inhuman reign of terror. "The darkest hour of Jugoslavia's history has begun." (D.B. Hall Home Service 1635; GOS 2000.)

Pointing out that all Soviet-controlled countries were tolerated only as long as the Kremlin saw fit, the German press was told to emphasize the recent Jugoslavia crisis as a manifestation of this policy. The Kremlin was dissatisfied with the so-called government of Josdou and organized mass demonstrations demanding a thorough purge of the federal apparatus, and a new government under the National Democratic Front, because this name served as a camouflage to the true identity of its members who were all Communists (D.B. Hall Home Service 1840).

Pacific Front: Japanese Imperial Headquarters acknowledged the American landings on Iwo Jima and placed the number of troops transported to the beaches at 10,000 and the troops at 100. During the first few hours, 1,000 Americans were killed, the German radio said. Simultaneously 280 American bombers were claimed to have attacked the "main island" of the Bonin group, and to have carried out attacks on Tokyo Friday, Saturday and Sunday designed to cover up the Two landings (D.B. Hall Home Service 2038, 2170).

Japanese troops were said to have broken into the rear of the American force in Iwo Jima, while other Japanese victories were claimed to have been thrown into the battle, thereby beginning a "new phase" of the fighting for the city (GOS 0845; GOS 2240).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: New penetrations were acknowledged on the First and Ninth Army fronts as American forces continued their powerful thrusts and drive towards the Rhine. Fighting was noted on the approaches to the Erft River before Cologne, while forces under Lt. Gen. Simpson were reported to be only six kilometers from Munzenich-Oldebach.

To the north, the Canadian First Army said to have entered the western outskirts of Cologne, while on the southern wing, the American Third Army was reported fighting inside Bitburg and along the road from Bitburg to Priker.

In a 60-minute broadcast to the home audience, Dr. Goebbels reviewed the entire war picture, acknowledging the "painful" developments of recent weeks but reaffirming that Germany would rather perish than surrender. He attempted to convey a growing feeling of hopelessness in Germany by pointing to Allied difficulties and by holding out the hope of eventual victory. Because of a decrease in the movement and flow potential with the loss of territory in the east, he asked for greater economy and production limitations so that the war effort would not be seriously affected.

Large-scale battles were anticipated in the near future on the eastern front, as both sides near the actual lines continue to move. The only notable Soviet gains of the day were reported in the Baltic area, where Russian forces were said to have broken through to Rostov.

2. EMPIRE NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:
   a. AMERICANS SIX KILOMETERS FROM MUNZENICH-OLDEBACH
   b. WE WILL RATTLE OUR TANKS UNTIL THEY RATTLE: CORDOY
   c. SOVIET DRIVE TOWARDS LUSITAN HIGHLIGHTS FRONT WEST
   d. CHURCHILL TOLD CONGRESS YOU COULDN'T TOLERATE LONDON HOLES
   e. AMERICAN PLANS TO DEFEND FINANCIAL SYSTEM IN FRANCE
   f. GERMAN DEFENDS LUSITAN FORCE IN BELGIUM
   g. THEY TOO JUMP DEFENDS ALL AMERICAN FORCES

   a. Western Front: Troops of the American Ninth Army striking northward from Bitburg were reported to have broken through the German lines to reach points only six kilometers west and southwest of Munzenich-Oldebach. While one flank was driving directly for the city, another appeared to be heading northwest to control German positions east of here.

   Despite increasing German resistance, it was acknowledged that the Allies were broadening their offensive front and had succeeded in deepening their penetrations during the day. It was estimated that, since the front in the Rhine sector the Allies had gained 30 kilometers on a 70-kilometer front in the past six days.

   With the main Allied pressure placed between Bitburg and Dueren, strong tank attacks were reported advancing eastward along the principal highways. South of Bitburg, in the First Army sector, the Americans said to have reached the Erft depression on an eight-kilometer front in their drive toward Cologne. East of Dueren, fighting was noted in the area of Elsaff and Still and on the approaches to the Erft River.

   German counterattacks in the afternoon and evening hours wiped out 100 American tanks, it was claimed, and made possible the construction of new defensive positions (German sources: CBS 2500; DNY Dial PS 1645).

   The loss by the Canadians of 500 tanks in the two days in the fighting in the northern sector was taken as an indication of their failure to achieve desired successes. At the same time, however, it was admitted that the First Canadian Army had advanced another two to three kilometers to reach the western outskirts of Cologne. The main pressure in this sector was concentrated on both sides of the river junction of Oden, south of Cologne, and on the railway line leading from Ger.

   On the Third Army Front, American forces were said to have entered Bitburg and to be encountering heavy battles with German troops on the road from Bitburg south to Priker. "Only slight progress" was reported by the forces moving north of Bitburg in the area between Bitburg and Frun.
At the bridgehead on the Lower Sow, American forces pressing westward from Arnhem were reported to have pinned further ground in the course of heavy battles (German census: GES 046; GIS 0000, 1400; DIN 0000 NS 231). In a report noting the increase of German submarine activity during February, it was claimed that 97 Allied ships totaling 150,000 tons had been sunk during the month, an average of two ships a day. Anglo-American bombers were reported to have attacked Leipzig, Hanover, and Hamburg (German census: GIS 100). American wounded were reported killed when a 15-ton German hospital train clearly marked with the Red Cross was attacked at the Bouches-Haut-France station (DIN 0000 NS 140).

b. German Home Front: Faced with a growing feeling of hopelessness and resignation within Germany, Dr. Goebbels went on the air last night with a review of the entire war picture, in which he often voiced the "painful" developments of recent weeks but asserted that the war was "by no means over" and that Germany would rather die than lay down its arms.

Repeatedly absconding the German people to meet the crisis with greater effort rather than a feeling of defeat, Dr. Goebbels hinted that the latest setbacks had convinced many Germans that the war was near. He urged them not to continue but with heroism or crisis with apathy and appealed to the people to shake themselves from their spiritual and moral confusion. Near the end of his unprecedented Goebbels speech, he made the revealing remark that he hoped his words would cause the soldiers at the front to "think about their war crimes," and the workers and farmers at home to "reach out to their tools, machines and plows" to fulfill their duty to the Fatherland.

Once again citing the Bolshevik atrocities in the east and the Anglo-American air terror as samples of the Allied annihilation plans that would be offset later in the event of a German defeat, Dr. Goebbels asserted that life under Allied rule would be "worse than hell" and that the German people would rather commit suicide than commit suicide. He declared that Germany's alternatives were either death or victory, he added dramatically: "We would rather die than capitulate."

Dr. Goebbels admitted that the deep Soviet penetrations were straining Germany's situation to the utmost and that even the most faithful could not avoid some discouragement at the turn of events. He promised that Germany would retain the lost territory but said he was not ready to disclose "when and how" it would be accomplished.

Pointing out that Germany's armament and food potential had been seriously affected by reverses in the east, Dr. Goebbels nevertheless affirmed that these losses were not so great that the war could only be carried on for a limited period. But he said the German people would have to be more economical; armament production would have to be simplified and moved to new focal points where the manpower potential could be more effectively utilized; and, in general, the German nation would have to resort to remarkable innovations to achieve its aims by improvisation what formerly could be accomplished by careful planning.

Dr. Goebbels attempted to show that the outcome of the war is now balanced on a "razor's edge," with the strain so heavy on either side that a "critical success or failure might suddenly tip the scales for Germany or the Allies. The stronger blows were being struck now by the Allies, but Germany would counter with increased employment of U-boats, marked by the bombardment of even larger sections of the British homeland, and a notable revival of the U-boat warfare."

In a report on the present position of both the Allies, Dr. Goebbels sought to prove that the situation was really no better in the French camp than in Germany. Russia was seen weakened by the loss of 15,000,000 men, with even her remaining troops weary and carried only by the hope of imminent victory. America was said to have suffered twice the number of its losses in the First World War, while politically it already was suffering a moral and political and had come to the realization that the Bolshevik type would sweep American influence from Europe. And Britain, led by its Allies "a small appendix of Europe," was viewed at the point of losing its empire, its national strength and its economic pattern of society.

He warned the Anglo-Americans that their abandonment of Europe to the "blood-thirsty" Soviet heroes would remain the eternal shame of the century, since they not only would fail to break "the tidal wave from Minor Asia," but at the same time would doom its path by inflicting a "satisfying air teror" on the defenders of Europe—the German people. According to the German people for the factual will of resistance and undeniable state-uniform "but will surely bring victory in the end," Dr. Goebbels assumed Germany's present position to that of a seriously ill person whose life had been hanged by a hair's breadth but who saved himself by an "inseparable will to live."

History would possess no high moral standard, said Dr. Goebbels, if it failed to justify Germany's long striving for a better and nobler existence.
But history does always move just in the lane run, and was now only subjecting the German people to the hardest and most cruel tests, even leading them to the edge of desperation, before preparing to burn over the calm of victory (DNB Hall Hess Service 1919; GHS 2320; Transocean Morse 2100).

In the middle "Review of the Situation," Dr. Edwards accused Churchill of bringing misery to the world by prolonging the war after 1940, when Hitler proposed a "constructive peace" which would have preserved the independence of Poland. Answering the Prime Minister's speech to the House of Commons, Edwards said his stress on freedom for Poland as one of the main factors of the war served as convincing evidence that Churchill could have saved millions of lives by accepting just such an offer when it was originally made.

Echoing Goebbels' statements, Dr. Edwards declared that the unhappy situation of the 12 Turczys and the Bolsheviks was meeting the strong resistances of a united 80,000,000 people who consider their freedom more important than life itself (GHS 1235).

Other transmitters on the Churchill speech highlighted his alleged admission of an acute Allii' shortage, and referring to Churchill's reported statement that he backs every man who kills a German, said this was another indication of the seamless capitulation to Stalin at Melta, since Britain's leader was not attempting to show himself as ruthless a murderer as the Bolsheviks (DNB Hall Hess Service 1919, 1935; GHS 1103).

ii. Eastern Front: The Soviet breakthrough towards the Baltic in the winter area was declared to have been the most historic recent development on the eastern front. Other battling on a larger scale were said to be in the offing because both sides for nearly reached the point of final preparations.

Karl Bluncker said that the Soviet drive in Central Persia had penetrated into the area north of Kvast in the east, and that tank spearheads had pushed further northwards to the Baltic under strong Russian air protection.

Germans emergency reserves which had been thrown into the battle to stop a widening of the still narrow corridor had closed down the drive.

In the adjoining section of Tuckel north the lower reaches of the Vistula, many Soviet tank and infantry attacks were said to have collapsed under strong defensive fire. In Southern Persia, the Garisons were reported to have made attacks about their own German forces around Stargard (Transocean Morse 1700, 1910; DNB Hall HS 140, GHS 2200).

Fighting on the Oder bank, according to Bluncker, has picked up in the past twenty-four hours. The Russians extended their bridgeheads on both sides of Krasnodar with the support of heavy artillery fire. But, he said, these positions on the west bank of the Oder are still too small to serve as springboards for the drive on Berlin (Transocean Morse 1910/ German Compa).

The other critical area, in Central Silsia was said to have remained stable. At Lusitz, the Soviet bridgeheads have remained unchanged, and at Forst and Cabin the German bridgeheads were reported to have withstanded heavy Soviet attacks.

In the battle area west and south of Braziu, the Russians were said to be still trying to break through German lines at Louba, Cal'berg, and on both sides of Zebben without success (DNB 2200, 0810; DNB Hall HS 2310).

The Russians were said to have been slowed down in East Prussia and in the Kurland fronts. Russian attacks west of Krasnostorf and east of Lubin had lost their force and cohesion (German Compa).

Strong Russian forces were reported trying to enter the Altgad Valley in Slovakia, and arm fighting was continuing.

b. Political Front: Churchill's speech to the House of Commons was used by German press service to stress the point of Britain's "defence at Yalta" and his submission to Stalin in the Polish problem. Writing of the border agreements, DNB said that those borders are not part of Polish territory, but part of the Bolshevik harmony in Europe and Soviet desires for territory in the west, Churchill accepted the Lublin government as the only Polish government, DNB said, and thus gave another blow to the London belt (DNB 2200). Voice broadcast added that Churchill had declared that he could not tolerate any other government of Poland (DNB 2200). Daily Express was said to have written that the British treasury would save more than 40 million pounds annually by recognition of the Warsaw belt. A voice broadcast suggested that, in addition, Britain would get back her expenses from the Polish gold at Dhalt (DNB 2200).

e. Eastern Europe: Press dispatches reported that Kornilov had said that the U.S. did not intend to recall the "inflation value" money used by Allied troops. The Americans thus declared that inflation in the western democracies did not concern them, and showed clearly that America plans to disrupt the financial system of all the occupied countries, they said (DNB 2200).

Churchill's statement about need for all shipping was interpreted to mean that there was no help for starving France. Bidault was said to have valued nothing in his talks with Eden on Churchill, and the French were now driven to competing with private pools (GHS 1700, 1230; GFS 2100).

f. Southeastern Europe: The German communiqué said, "The enemy forces which landed on the southern point of the Dalmatian Islands of far have been thrown back into the sea by German counter-attacks."

German interest in the Roumanian government crisis appeared to have died down somewhat. They reported that "the Bolshevik mass butcher, Mochinski," had arrived in Bucharest (DNB 2200).

The Swedish newspaper Dagsposten was said to have written that the unrest in Roumania was undoubtedly inspired by the Russians. The voice broadcasts added that this event was a good warning for Finland and Bulgaria who would soon see the same thing happen to them (GFS 1100).

g. Italian Front: Voice broadcasts said that the American attacks on two Wireless 300,000 pounds in capital were launched from 10 cruisers and about 200 transports which were now about nine miles southwest of the island. Although the island is only fourteen square miles in area, they said, the American Navy, Air Force and Army have been put to their most difficult trial to take it (GHS 1700).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: The great battle between the Roer and Rhine was reported moving toward its climax as the four Allied shock armies struck each day with increased violence. Despite the heavy Allied blows, it was pointed out that large German forces had neither been cut off nor encircled.

Advanced Allied units were placed inside Krefeld and Neuss in some reports; even claims that an unsuccessful attempt had been made to get across the Rhine from Neuss into Dusseldorf.

Some front propaganda reported gain to the Bolsheviks' hope, asserting that post-war Europe could not be dominated by either Britain or America but would belong either to Europeans in whose name Germany is fighting or to the inner-Israeled Bolsheviks. Taking their theme from an alleged statement in the Daily Mail that only Czecho-Slovaks had predicted Britain's capitulation to Soviet Russia as exemplified in the Polish question, numerous transmissions went on to point out that the Anglo-Americans soon will realize that the true basis of this war is Germany's struggle for cultural life against the terrible threat of Bolshevism.

The German situation in recent days was called "critical" as the Russians launched increasingly strong attacks toward the Rhine. In the south, the Soviets were said to be building up their bridgeheads across the Rhine in preparation for new drives.

2. DAILY NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:
   a. ALLIES FAIL IN FIRST ATTEMPT TO CROSS RHINE
   b. ANGLO-AMERICAN SOLDIERS DIE FOR BOLSHEVIK'S FORTRESS
   c. GERMANS' ALARM SITUATION IN POMERANIA IS CRITICAL
   d. ALLIES WON'T CONSIDER LIGHTEN ITALIAN ARMS STANDS

3. Western Front: As four Allied shock armies continue their onslaught in the field of the Westphalian industrial district, employing all available reserves in men, tanks, artillery and planes, the great battle between the Roer and the Rhine is first moving toward its climax, according to Trencau's military correspondent Walter Ploto.

Although the attacks of the Canadian First, British Second and American First and Sixth Armies increase in violence each day, the Allies have still not succeeded in cutting off or encircling large contingents of German forces, said Ploto. The Allied High Command was particularly said to have failed in its objective of annihilating the two German armies stationed on the west bank of the Rhine between the cities of Xanten and Cologne (Transcussion Horse 1805).

While the communiqué placed most advanced Allied units inside Krefeld and Neuss, it was claimed in an evening domestic broadcast that the first attempt had been made to cross the Rhine. This initial try was said to have taken place at the south bridge leading from Neuss into Dusseldorf, and was reported to have failed. In other transmissions, it was merely stated that the Allies had tried to close up to the west bank of the Rhine between Slevor and Dusseldorf (GHS 1930, 2000, 2200).

A German reporter writing from the rift front before Cologne spoke of the "living inferno" in the sector under attack by the Ninth and First Armies. "A veritable rain of fire is directed against our troops," he stated. "Then 20, 30, sometimes 70 tanks go over to the attack, usually frontally at first, and later trying for an encirclement. The Allied airforce also is being employed to an incredible extent. They are everywhere and bomb and strafe everything that moves. . . . One must know how hard the fight is to realize the achievement of our troops after all these days of bloody attacks in being able to prevent the Allies even from seeing the spires of the Cologne cathedral (GHS 1930).

After strong artillery preparation, the British and Canadians in the north were reported to have launched new attacks east of Goch and farther to the south of Geldern. The British were said to have reached the road leading from Geldern to Krefeld.

German formations were claimed holding their positions around Aachen-Gladbach, while after a tank battle lasting several hours, it was admitted that units of the Ninth Army broke through to advance into Krefeld. Bitter house-to-house fighting was said to be going on in the southern part of the city, and fighting was also reported inside House on the west bank of the Rhine before Aachen.

It was stated that the first army had stormed the German front without civil, but the penetration of Lommersum was acknowledged. It was likewise admitted that after heavy night fighting the Americans had occupied Guelphich, southeast of Dusseldorf and southwest of Cologne.

On the Third Army front, General Patton's forces were said to have penetrated the defense positions between the Saar and Kyll Rivers and to have advanced to strength on the northern bank of the Moselle. Tank units reportedly entered Trier from the south and heavy battles were said to be in progress in the city (German Times; Transocean Horse 1730; OTH 1600; DBB Bell L5 1930, 2225; OTH 0900, 2200).

b. German Home Front: The possibility of British or American domination in post-war Europe was denied last night by Hans Fritzsche when he declared that Europe would belong either to the Europeans in whose name Germany is fighting or to the inner-Asian Bolsheviks who have been able to entice by great European people of culture, the Russians.

Fritzsche said the Anglo-American command was attempting to gain some troops through new advances in the west and the intensified air terror, but maintained that the Bolshevik might grows with every bomb dropped on a German town and that "every British and American soldier fallen in the field dies as a pioneer for Bolshevism."

The new anti-Bolshevik tide, highlighted by Fritzsche in the evening commentary, by Hans Hertel in the midday "review of the Situation" and in numerous transmissions during the day, received its impetus from an alleged statement in the Daily Bell to the effect that only Joseph Goebbels had predicted the British capitulation to Bolshevism as manifested in acceptance of the Provisional Polish Government.

Recognition of the correct German prophecy on this score was viewed by Fritzsche as only the first of many points on which Britain will realize the veracity of German warnings. Soon, he said, the Anglo-Americans will awaken to the fact that in waging war against national socialism they fought against the rejuvenation of an old cultural people seeking to withstand Bolshevism. And they will learn that the basic issue of the war was not democracy versus a state based on the leadership principle but the battle for life of a cultural people in an epoch overshadowed by the threat of Bolshevism.

People within Britain and the United States already were said to be seeing that the slogan "Death to the Fasch" was not ensuring the creation of a "basis for a durable peace," and was in fact telling Soviet dominance over Finland, Ukraine, Bulgaria, Greece, Belgium, France, and Italy, as well as Poland. But while they permit their leaders to engage in political juggling that allows a Soviet Poland and a Soviet Hungary just because of expediency, the German people continue the fight for the preservation of their freedom and the development of their own culture, declared Fritzsche (GHS 1605).

The capitulation of Britain to the soviet as epitomized in the Polish question was seen by Hertel as another factor in the growing disappointment of the British people, who already view the Atlantic Charter as a worthless document and resent the inability of Churchill to stem the growing tide of Bolshevism even in the supposed British spheres of influence in Europe. This line was picked up almost verbatim in other transmissions (GHS 2100; GHS 1600; DBB Bell ES 1715).

Hertel said the Allies have practical as well as political worries, pointing to the lack of shipping and growing number of strikes in Britain and the closing-down of numerous factories in America because of strikes (GHS 1250).

In a broadcast from the besieged fortress of Breslau, Goelerter Hanke asserted that the tens of thousands of men and women holding out against the Soviet assault have discovered the strength that has enabled the Atlantic stranglepoints to resist so long. They have learned to put along without every personal thing to which their hearts had grown attached—their homes, property, possessions—and what is of value to them now is the power of their fists, the inventive spirit to find new strength to resist, and the faith in their work that will later aid them in rebuilding all that has been destroyed.
Only today, said Benke, have the German people learned what it means to make real total war. Even after the greatest defeat and the greatest suffering, they found it possible to mobilize more forces, and in the city of Breslau thousands of dutiful men and women are in the streets from dawn to dark clearing the debris to make way for tanks and armored cars. Facing the enemy, meanwhile, together with the Wehrmacht, are 60-year-old men of the Volkssturm and boys of the Hitler Youth, all fighting with equal valor.

It is not only idealism that makes them continue the battle, declared Benke, but the sober realization that resistential wears the enemy power, keeps the enemy from using an important railway junction, makes shipping impossible on the Oder and stars the Bolshevick army advance (GHS 1940).

Emphasis again was placed on reports of Bolshevick atrocities in the east. Adverse reports of Soviet troops were pictured torturing, raping, deporting and liquidating in every village and town they capture, and everywhere, it was said, there could be seen the "fearsome results of the terrorism of the bestial hordes."

The systematic bond terror of the Anglo-Americans in the west was labeled no less an atrocity, and an editorial in the Washington Post maintaining that the Allies were carrying out "inhuman warfare" was attacked as deliberate falsification. The air war is being carried out by murderers and plunderers, it was asserted, is evident in the elaborate slaughter of civilian populations by the British air gangsters and the bombing of American fliers over their successful attacks on the fleeing refugees in Berlin and Dresden (DNB Hell HS 0030, 1225, 1920).

c. Eastern Front: The situation for the Germans in Pomerania was said last night to have become critical as the Russians launched increasingly strong attacks towards the Baltic. The most important battles on the east front, according to voice broadcasts, were being fought in West Prussia and Pomerania. Press dispatches said that the Russians were again beginning to expand their Oder bridgeheads at Gorlitz by means of local attacks.

Voice broadcasts said that in Pomerania, great Soviet tank forces, followed by motorized infantry, had been able to make some advances toward the Baltic. The "narrow" penetration was said to consist largely of tank spearheads which had advanced east of Stargard to Dassendorf where they were reported to have been stopped by fresh German reserves from the west (GFS 1000; GHS 2000).

The Soviet forces were also said to have attacked towards the Neustettin area at several places. The principal Russian thrust was in the direction of the area north of Neustettin where the tank units were met with other German reserves. Heavy battles were also reported southwest of Kummersdorf where the Germans counter-attacked in battles that continue undetected. Other fierce battles to the south, in the Pyritz-Arnswalde sector, were said to be growing more violent (DNB Hell HS 2354).

The German communiqué did not mention the Oder bond fighting, but press dispatches reported activity increasing in the area as Russian forces launched local attacks in the Gorlitz bridgehead area with recently-brought-up reinforcements. The report said many Russian guns and tanks were destroyed (DNB Hell HS 2359).

Reports on fighting in Pillau claimed that Soviet attacks on Zobten were still being held off, and that the Germans were able to make some advances in the area of Lauben. Voice broadcasts admitted that there was fighting in the streets of Lauben, and that the town of Hanowerhof had fallen to the soviets. They claimed to have wiped out a Soviet bridgehead between Zobten and Lauban, and said that the battle for Zobten was still going on (GFS 1100).

In East Prussia, the Germans claimed to be fighting successful defensive battles against five Soviet armies which were trying to break through east of Lichtensfeld and east. Here too, the Russians were said to be using fresh troops which were attacking through heavy snowfall (DNB Hell HS 2355; German communiqué).

d. Italian Front: The German communiqué reported that Allied attacks north and northeast of Rome in Central Italy had failed in spite of their long artillery preparation.

Press dispatches reported that the Italian Foreign Minister had announced that it was impossible to lighten the conditions of the war because Washington opposed it. It had been hoped, the dispatch said, that the actual misery of the occupied parts of Italy would have been taken into account, but such had not been the case. A voice broadcast added that, in addition, the Italians would have to pay all the costs of the occupation (DNB Hell HS 1832; GHS 1700).

c. Political Fronts: Russia was said to have hardly waited until the Yalta conference was over before launching her decisive blow against Rumania. DNB said that the Kremlin didn't even bother about the agreements to discuss such business with the other partners, but went right ahead in forcing the Nadescu government to resign.

Already, the dispatch claimed, the successor to Nadescu had been accused of not cleaning out the internal government sufficiently, and London circles aren't satisfied with him either (DNB Hell HS 9840).

Neutral journalists were said to have reported that the wife of the present Prime minister of the London Polish government had been arrested by the Russians (GHS 1350).

d. Western Europe: A gang of American deserters were reported to have been finally captured by the police after they had lived a long time by the black market in Paris and indulged in "sensational" orgies (DNB Hell HS 1000; GHS 1400). Parisians were said to be demonstrating in Paris with placards asking for bread instead of films (GHS 1000).

e. Southeastern Europe: Voice broadcasts reported that King Peter of Jugoslavia had given in to Tito and Churchill. He was said to have agreed to the establishment of a Regency, and had thus "given his consent to the Bolshevisation of Jugoslavia" (GHS 2000).

According to Berlin, Tass reported that King Michael of Rumania had asked Dr. Petru Cross to form the new government. Cross, they said, was a Bolshevik whose appointment had really come from Vyshinsky. Here too, "the way was open for the rapid Bolshevisation of Rumania" (GHS 2000).

BROADCAST PROPAGANDA, TRENDS AND ANALYSIS

Covering Broadcasts from 0001 6 March to 0001 7 March

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: Minimum or ignoring the significant Allied gains on the west front, German military observers present an optimistic view of the situation to the domestic audience. It was pointed out that the Allies had not achieved their objective of destroying the German army west of the Rhine; that they still faced crossing of the river, their "greatest natural obstacle" since the invasion; and that losses had been so heavy during the drive that Allied leaders had been forced to extort their troops with loudspeakers and leaflets.

Operational reports acknowledged, however, that the Allies had reached the Rhine north of Kehl and, above Remagen and south of Mainz and that fighting was taking place in the western suburbs of Cologne. There was no mention of General Patton's thrust west of the Kyll River.

Documentary "evidence" of a systematic Soviet plan for the extermination of the German people in the east was presented at a press conference yesterday by Lt. Gen. Guderian, Chief of Staff of the German Army, and Reclus Press Chief Dietrich. Testimony of German soldiers and civilians was quoted to prove that German women and girls were raped, old men shot, young men deported or killed and food stocks and homes destroyed in every sector overrun by the Soviet armies.

Reports on fighting in the east emphasized the Soviet break-throughs in Pomerania, where the Russian troops were said to have advanced from Neuburg north to Lauen on to hold positions from Wellin Island.

2. MAIN NEWS AND BROADCAST PROPAGANDA:

a. ALLIES SUFFERED TO DECLARE GERMANY SAFELY FREE OF NAZIS
b. GERMAN DOCUMENTS SHOWED "EXTERMINATION PLAN"
c. REPORTED HITLER TOLD OF GERMAN DREAD OF RUSSIAN ADVANCEMENTS

d. GERMAN OFFICIALS TOLD OF "GERMAN PROGRESS" IN ALLIED INFRONT

3. ALLIED CAMPAIGN IN WEST:

a. WESTERN FRONT: Admitting only that American troops were fighting in the western suburbs of Cologne and that the Allies had reached the Rhine on a frontal front near Dusseldorf, German transmissions attempted to paint an optimistic picture for the home audience on the situation in the west.

It was pointed out that the Allies had not achieved their main goal—the destruction of the German army west of the Rhine—nor that millions were captured in the number of prisoners and captured weapons. The Rhine itself was described as "the greatest natural obstacle" facing the Allies since the beginning of the invasion, and they were still not believed ready to attempt any crossings because the river had not yet been reached "on a wide front." Lorses suffered by the Allies since the start of the offensive were claimed to be so high that the Allied High Command was forced to use leaflets and loudspeakers to encourage their own troops, exhorting them to greater efforts with the promise that "this is the final push" (GB 2900, 2100, 2200; GB 1100; DNB Feb 18 1945).

Operational reports, lacking to acknowledge Allied claims of the fall of Cologne and a lightning advance by General Patton 30 miles beyond the Kyll River, attempted to show that stiffening German resistance had held the Allies to only slight gains in most sectors. Despite Allied progress to the edge of the Rhine north of Kehl, above Remagen and south of Neuss, the German forces were reported still holding six bridgeheads on the western bank of the river. These were listed by the High Command spokesmen as follows: the largest, near the west end including the city of Xanten; near Rheinberg; near Gröp, north of Remagen; in the vicinity of Duitsburg; near Dusseldorf; and the area including the city of Cologne (Transpointes March 1648).

The most stubborn German defense was noted on the northern wing of the front, where the strong attack of the Canadian First Army strain was stopped north and south of Xanten. Strong Allied tank forces also were reported checked north of Issum, but it was admitted that British and Canadian troops advanced to the area of Rheinberg and reached the Rhine bend at Offenburg.
Kamp and Lintfort fell to the advancing Allies, but Orsay was reported still holding out. In four days, the Allies were said to have lost 200 tanks in the northern sector.

Along the entire front between Duesseldorf and Homberg the Allied were advancing in the direction of the Rhine against fierce German opposition, according to the Associated American gains were recorded near Homberg and Rheinhausen, before Duesseldorf; at the approaches to the Rhine south of Duesseldorf; on the west bank opposite Leverkusen; on the western fringes of Cologne; and at the town of Brühl, south of Cologne.

On the American Third Army front, numerous thrusts at the lower reaches of the Kyll were claimed repulsed at Karlsruhe, north of Trier, and at advanced positions east of Trier. Only local pellbox fighting was reported from the territory south of Saarbruecken (German Conquered; Frankreich 1949; NEB Hall Hs 2200, 2315; GHS 2000).

Allied bombers were reported to have attacked Chemitz, near Hanburg and Gelsenkirchen, while German aircraft were said to have bombed the machinegunned industrial terraces and military installations in "illuminated" localities in England (German Conquest).

b. German Home Front: Lt. Gen. Guderian, Chief of Staff of the German Army, yesterday accused the Soviet Army of carrying out a systematic plan for the extermination of the German people during the drive into German territory in the east.

At a press conference in Berlin called by the press chief of the Gendarmerie, Guderian claimed that by the such programs concerning alleged German atrocities Bolshevik troops had first been whipped into a "sacralium of annihilation" and then at the offensive were clearly directed by their commanders and enrolments to plunder and murder.

As proof of this assertion, Guderian cited the "horrible" order issued by Marshal Zhukov in the First White Russian front, which he described as "the most abominable and odious document ever issued by a soldier."

This document, said Guderian, listed, amongst German atrocities, the burning of villages and the deliberate destruction of the "horrible Russian soldiers" and followed with such provoking words as "The task now is to finish up the Russian beast." Therefore, he pointed out, whatever the Soviet troops are doing now in the way of murders, tortures, raping and plundering is in accordance with the contents and spirit of this order—an order which represents the will of Moscow.

Labeling the Soviet cruelties in the east "the most horrible and horrible events in modern history," Guderian asserted that they had united the German people for the decisive fight to check and beat back the frightful slaughter "with all the order of our soul, all the passion of our heart and all our mental effort we are preparing for the last great and decisive battle," declared Guderian.

In support of Guderian's statements, Maj. Gen. Dietrich presented a catalogue of reported Soviet atrocities, allegedly based on evidence offered by two German officers and their men, the commander of the Fuerstenburg garrison, a member of the Volkssturm, who were said to have been, in 1941, a former engineer in the east and a woman from West Russia. Their experiences were viewed as representative of the terrorism being suffered by hundreds of thousands of Germans.

The testimony of each of the witnesses was presented in great detail, with the general conclusions as follows: 1. All German women and girls are raped; 2. The majority of old men are shot; 3. Young men are deported or killed; 4. Villages of the German rural population are systematically destroyed, and so far the Red Army is not using these stocks; 5. Germans are forced to dig trenches and are not fed; 6. Houses are necessary for billets or supplies are destroyed; 7. Many German soldiers are tortured and then shot in the name of the neck and their pets are stolen (Transocean, & 1937, 1975; NEB Hall Hs 2015).

In an impassioned radio address to the domestic audience, Maj. Gen. Rehmer likewise stressed Soviet crimes in the east, affirming that they had burned a hatred into the heart of the German soldier which would not be erased until every atrocity had been avenged. Reporting stories told to him at Arnswalde, Rehmer said almost every woman and girl rape from the east had been raped, old men and women and children tortured and murdered and most houses leveled.
Inevitable chaos in all parts of Europe taken by the Bolsheviks and the Plutocrates was predicted by Dr. Otto Krieger in the middle "Review of the Situation." For Germany's enemies Dr. Krieger saw only the alternatives of destroying Germany and then disappearing into chaos or falling into chaos without being able to defeat Germany; while Germany itself had the choice of experiencing its own destruction and watching the world slide into chaos, or defending its life and preserving its unity so that all of Europe could be saved from chaos.

First evidences of the impending chaos were seen by Krieger in the "liberated" countries of Europe, where under Stalin's direction, the people were being permitted to starve since hunger is the requisite for political chaos and political chaos is the necessary condition for the advance of Bolshevism. Churchill and Roosevelt have repeated the "lie" that they would be willing to counteract the hunger catastrophe, said Krieger, but they know they are helpless in the face of Stalin's determination to effect his well-known Bolshevist methods.

In place of the "World peace" visualized by Churchill and Roosevelt in recent addresses to their people, Krieger anticipated a Bolshevist dictatorship in Europe; Bolshevik and American domination of Europe; and dictatorial exploitation by a handful of plutocrats and rich American Jews of all parts of the world not dominated by the Commissars (GUS 1230).

Other items highlighted in domestic transmissions were Krieger's entry into the war as the servant of Bolshevism; the revival of the German-occupied Western countries; and the renewal of German troops on both the east and west fronts (Der Stern 1245; 1335; 1430; GUS 1230, 1360, 2300).

The increasing irregularities in German transmissions noted in recent days continued again yesterday. The force this time was not carried over its usual length from Stuttgart at 1000 o'clock. Stuttgart presented a musical program instead of the "Soldier's Hour." The Holleschreiber, which was silent for four hours the previous night, remained off the air yesterday until 1330. At that time the German Service started, but the program was not to end until late afternoon.

(Lt. Col. Bitterman's regularly scheduled Tuesday night address was not delivered last night. It was cancelled at 1900 with the announcement that he would probably speak in Thursday, 3 March)

o. Eastern Front: The Russians were said to be taking advantage of their breakthroughs in Łomża to extend their gains east and west. The greatest losses were being fought between the lower Oder and the Vistula where the Soviets were said to have thrown in all of their operational reserves, including tanks which were formerly southeast of Greifswald.

A German military spokesman said that Kamianka-Malin were new German bridgesheads on the western front because Soviet forces had advanced from Stettin north to the Kamianka area where they were half positions facing Malin Island. The Soviet-occupied territory was said to be encircled in the east by a front running from the east of Malin through Stettin and west of Stettin to the Oder at Schleede. The western side of Soviet-held territory in Kœnigsluck followed a line through Saline, Kamensburg, Bölow and Heiderode (Transocean Morse 1245).

The most important battles in Kœnigsluck were being fought between Stettin and Greifswald where voice broadcasts told the Soviets were using 3 infantry armies and one tank army. Focal points of the battle were northwest of Stettin, and on both sides of the line river. The main Soviet attacks were between Kamianka and Stettin, and on both sides of the Stettin-Bothnian road. Further to the east, at Kolberg and Bolgards, Soviet forces were reported to have made considerable gains (GUS 2300).

The communiqué reported that one German army in Kœnigsluck had destroyed 300 tanks in the past week. 125 of them were destroyed by close quarter weapons.

In West Russia, Soviet forces continued to attack on a broad front with great losses of materiel. The communiqué said that penetrations had been limited to slight gains northeast of Kamensburg and south of Grasswelltal.

Soviet attacks in East Russia were declared to have slowed because of heavy losses in men and material. The Germans claimed to have eliminated old Soviet penetrations north of Zienst (DNS Hill 85 2200).

d. Italian Front: The German communiqué reported that in the Abruzzi Apennines, Allied forces had extended their pressure to include the entire sector between Mentone and Vinezato. The attacks were halted before mountain positions.

We said the main Allied attacks were launched against German mountain positions northeast of Monte Belvedere to eliminate heavy weapons there which had been effective against the Fossetta Valley road (DNS Hill 2200).

Vide broadcasts reported growing Fascist sentiment in Allied-held Italy. Recent arrests were said to prove that Italian officers were joining the Fascist movement (GHS 1700). The government was said to be powerless against the "Nazi and Social Justice" movement, which was said to be based on Fascist, and spreading rapidly (GHS 1100).

e. Political Fronts: Press dispatches reported that Sweden had not been invited to attend the San Francisco Conference. Sweden had refused to go when the conditions she asked were refused (DNS Hill 1185, 2335).

The spokesman for American forces was said to have protested against Roosevelt's statements about the results of the Yalta conference. He spoke in behalf of 150,000 young nurses who couldn't go home because they would be sent to Siberia (DNS 1100).

f. Western Europe: More than 3,000 women were said to have taken part in demonstrations for more food in Belgium. They marched in the town hall crying that their children were dying for lack of food (DNS Hill 1625; GHS 1700).

The American ambassador and a British naval officer were reported to have said that the misery and suffering of the French population was growing worse, and that the food situation was beyond imagination (GHS 1600; GFS 1100, 2100).

g. Southeastern Europe: The German communiqué reported that in March, the fighting in Serbia and part of Yugoslavia had cost more than 700 dead, 250 machine guns, and 1,300 prisoners. Most of the equipment taken was described as of British origin.

The agency in Belgrade was said to have asked Tito to form a new government, and voice broadcasts declared that he would hold the posts of Prime Minister and War Minister (DNS Hill 1228; GHS 1230).

DNS said that after great effort some Anglo-American correspondents had been permitted to visit Belgrade. They were said to have found the town completely Bolshevized, with photographs of Stalin and the red star found at every corner (DNS Hill 1640).

h. Pacific Front: The Japanese Imperial Communiqué reported fighting on Iwo Jim with the announcement that the Americans had suffered 20,000 casualties since the beginning of the landings operations. During this time, 250 American tanks were said to have been knocked out.

The Japanese position was "heroically resisting" from its heights in the northeastern part of the island (DNS Hill 1620; GHS 1600).

Tokyo admitted that Corregidor had been cut off from Japanese forces on Luzon, but said that their troops on Corregidor were still resisting (GHS 1700). Another report claimed that Japanese anti-aircraft had shot down 24 American planes out of 60 which had raided the island of Mindanao (GHS 1230).

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: General Patton's spectacular drive from the Kyll River to the Upper Rhine Valley was claimed to have been the only significant new Allied success, as progress of the Anglo-American armies in the west reportedly "slackened considerably." It was acknowledged, however, that the Allies had taken Kehlburg in the northern sector, were fighting in the heart of Cologne, and had captured Rheinbach, between Bonn and Koblenz.

The simultaneous offensives of the Anglo-Americans in the west and Soviets in the east were inflicting "bitter and painful defeats" on the German forces, said Dr. Joseph Stal, but Germany could not lose as long as her soldiers continued to display fanatical bravery and her home front continued to bear with such devotion the terrible sufferings of war. Dr. Stal stated that the decisive battle to determine Germany's humiliation or existence would soon begin.

After a lull of several weeks, the Russians were reported to have renewed their assaults in the central sector between Kustrin and Frankfurt on the Oder. The new drive was said to have been preceded by strong artillery preparation.

3. WESTERN FRONT: The speedy advance of General Patton's tank spearheads from the Kyll River to the Upper Rhine Valley in the past few days was described by Transonic's military commentator Ludwig Sertorius as the most significant Allied success on the western front. In all other sectors, he claimed, the Allied advance has "considerably slackened."

At the present time the American Third Army was seen heading for the Rhine at Simay end Bonn, between Bonn and Koblenz, but Sertorius predicted that Patton was preparing for one of two alternative moves: to take a sharp turn northward to join the American First Army in an offensive against Bonn from the Kehl-Rheinbach line, or to wheel around to the southeast to attack the flank and rear of the Saar District. The attack against the Saar was believed less likely since it would mean the loss of Saarbrücken and other important cities near the Saar.

Although Sertorius insisted that the Third Army front was the only sector where the Allies were able to gain ground, other reports noted the loss of Rhein 마인, just west of the Rhine below Mainz, and admitted that bitter street fighting was in progress in Cologne (German comey: DBP Hall 1115; GFS 2100).

American units were said to have penetrated to the downtown area of Cologne after fighting their way forward from the western suburbs. Some tank spearheads were acknowledged to have reached the West Station, where they were reportedly stopped by fierce German resistance (GFS 000; GFS 2100).

It was generally admitted that the Allies had succeeded in reaching the Rhine on a wide front, but several reports insisted that they had failed to trap the German army west of the Rhine and therefore the pincers which were now closing north and south of Cologne was not achieving its primary purpose -- the destruction of the Wehrmacht (GFS 2100; GFS 1950).

While the Allies were said to be employing greater masses of men and material than had ever appeared before on the western front, it was claimed that their losses were likewise exceptionally high. During the present drive, it was stated, the Allies are losing one to two divisions daily.
In the northern sector of the front, German troops were reported to have derived heavy attacks by the Canadian First Army southwest of Xanten and at Koln. The German bridgehead west of the Rhine at Wesel was deployed still intact, but it was acknowledged that the bridgehead to the south of Rheinberg had been narrowed as the Ninth Army took the town and pushed on toward the river.

Heavy battles were reported in progress along a line running from Koln south to Brühl and Buskirchen, and it was admitted that in the near east of Buskirchen the First Army took Rheinbach and advanced toward the Rhine.

As American forces pressed forward to the Rhine at numerous points, it was stated that between Rheinberg and Cologne German forces were continuing to pour across the river to take up defensive positions on the east bank (German commun. 26 Nov 1944; GHS 1950; GHS 2000, 2000).

b. German Home Front: As Allied troops in the east and west slashed deeper into Germany, inflicting "sister and painful defeat" on the German forces, the German people are now finding themselves for the approaching decisive battle that will determine the continued existence or annihilation of the German nation, declared Dr. Joseph Stal in yesterday's "Review of the Situation."

Seeing reason for hope in the devotion of the home front, which has borne "suffering that almost reaches the limit of human endurance," and the "fantatical bravery" of the German troops, whose courage prevents confinement on the west side of the Rhine, Dr. Stal affirmed that as long as the German people stand on their own legs, obliterating all heavy blows, the war could not be lost.

The picture of mass murder in the east presented by Lt. Gen. Guderian the previous day was viewed by Dr. Stal as a factor that would "unite the German people for practical defense" because of their realization of the terrible fate that would await them if they gave up the fight.

Dr. Stal repeated many of the phrases from Guderian's speech reiterating the contention that atrocities committed by Soviet troops were ordered by the Kremlin as the first phase of the systematic plan to exterminate the German nation (GHS 1945).

With the way opened by Guderian's documentary brutality report, domestic transmissions continued to harp on the theme of Bolshevik murder, rape, robbery and treachery. The Guderian speech was frequently cited with the addition of some new story of terrorism from the front, and the talk on Soviet brutality delivered the previous day by Maj. Gena Kholer was transmitted twice over the German Home Service. It was suggested several times that Anglo-American forces in the west are as guilty as the Bolsheviks, purposely poisoning and killing German civilians and withholding food and water from the populace after occupying a town (GHS 1950; GHS 2000, 2000).

The assertion that the Allies had failed in their main objective--destruction of the Wehrmacht on the west side of the Rhine--was repeated frequently during the day. It was pointed out that as long as the German army is not decisively defeated and German people of all ages continue to display "unbelievable readiness to sacrifice" Germany will be in a position to halt the strongest Allied assaults. The fighting spirit of German youth performing various war tasks in the frontlines was viewed as exemplifying the unwavering strength of resistance of the German people (GHS 1950, 1950, 1950; GHS 1950).

A pledge that Germany would prove itself stronger "than all its invaders combined" in the forthcoming decisive battles was made by Deputy Press Chief Sueermann in a special message for the German newspapers. Criticizing Prime Minister Churchill for his declaration on German soil that the Allies were prepared to "beat down the tyrants," Sueermann said Churchill had shown the wrong part of Germany for his battle to down the tyrants--for "there's only one single tyrant in the world today, and that is Stalin" (Transocean News 1950).

In a review of the legal rights of refugees, Solicitor Dr. Schlicht emphasized that the first duty of refugees on arrival in a new area is to report to the police for ration cards and instructions on subsistence.
Persons carrying cash or possessing bank accounts were declared ineligible for the refugees subsistence allowance. Refugees who are relatives of soldiers were urged to report to community or district authorities for renewal of their regular Army allowance. Owners of houses, even though not
The rumor, which a war rumor can spread from one person to thousands in a few hours, was described in an evening broadcast, with the warning that dissemination of rumors could become a "destructive weapon" weakening German resistance. On hearing a rumor every German was urged to ask the following questions before passing it on: "Did you witness the story you just told me? Who told you? Do you take the responsibility about the truth of it? I would like to verify the story; would you mind giving me your name and address?" (GHS 2100).

The threat of Bolshevization of Europe received more than usual play, with emphasis on an alleged story from the New York Journal-American which stated that Americans believe they are bringing democracy to the nations of Europe, while the truth is that Bolshevism is flooding the continent—and Bolshevism is far from democracy. It was also claimed that Soviet newspapers have attacked the American writer William White for his book describing the poverty and low standards of living in Soviet Russia (LDB Bull NS 1200, 1745, 1910, 2000; GHS 0900, 1100, 1700, 2200).

British naval and air leaders were said to have commented recently on the increased danger of the German U-boats and V-weapons. They were quoted as stating that U-boats are operating in growing numbers in the Channel, while V-weapons are now falling over a wide area of England (GHS 0900, 2200; GHS 1100; LDB Bull NS 1045).

German transmissions during the day were generally more regular, although the Hellenschreiber was off the air from 0900 to 1600, from 1200 to 1930, and from 1900 to 2400.

Eastern Front: Russian forces on the northern front have developed strong attacks in the Oder-Bug area to gain bases for large-scale operations and to knock out Kuestrin. Heavy fighting continued in Eastern Pomerania as the Soviets struck for the Stettiner Haff. German successes were reported in the Leuten on southern areas of Silesia.

Highlighted eastern front news were the preliminary German reports that fierce fighting, after a long artillery preparation, had broken out again in the Oder-Bug sector, between Kuestrin and Frankfurt. Voice broadcasts said that the many Russian attacks employed very strong forces, and that it could be expected that the battle would develop into a large-scale effort. After seven unsuccessful attempts the Russians were said to have broken into the northeastern part of German positions," but were held by counterattacks (GHS Bull NS 1645; GHS 1930).

In Pomerania, fighting was said to continue with unflinching intensity as Soviet forces struck for a breakthrough between Stargard and Kamzin in the direction of Stettiner Haff. Other strong attacks were reported to have been repelled in the Wolin region. Along the Baltic coast, important Soviet gains were admitted, and the town of Kolberg was said to be under constant heavy attack by tank units (GHS 2200).

Press dispatches reported that in central Silesia German counterattacks on both sides of Leuten had led to the encirclement of strong Soviet groups northeast of the town, in spite of the resistance of Russian tank units. Other German successes were said to have been east of Golenitz, and on the northern wing where German units crossed the Queiss in a broad front (LDB Bull NS 1655).

Speaking of the encircled cities which were still claimed to be holding out, voice broadcasts said that Golenitz was still resisting overwhelming Soviet superiority. Brusilov's resistance was said to break Soviet supply lines, prevent the use of the Oder for shipping, and to interrupt important railroad lines (GHS 1100).

Reports on fighting in the Danzig area said that strong Soviet thrusts towards Danzig had been frustrated, and great losses had been inflicted on the Soviet tank units. One voice broadcast admitted a deep penetration in this area which "still didn't break the will of our troops."

Comment on the Baltic front sector was limited to the statement that positions which had been recaptured north of Zolin were successfully defended yesterday against strong Soviet attacks (GHS 2200, German source).

In the southern part of the front, Russian forces continued to attack the frontal arch of Atzehol but couldn't enter the upper Gran Valley.
4. Italian Front: The German communique said that American and Brazilian forces had not been able to keep up their attacks north of Korotna because of their heavy losses. German counterattacks were said to have thrown the Allies back several miles.

A British battle group which tried to land behind the German lines in the Adriatic coast was said to have been repulsed.

Continuing to point out indications of the growth of Fascism in Allied-held Italy, voice broadcasts said that anti-Semitic demonstrations had broken out because Jews had been granted special ration cards for Mussolini.

Rossi dispatches said that the escape of General Kosta on the day before his trial had brought about another crisis in Italy. All sections were said to be blaming each other, and protest meetings were interrupted by shooting and bombs (DNB 2200)."

EMBASSY BROADCAST PROPAGANDA, TRENDS AND ANALYSIS
Covering Broadcasts from 0001 8 March to 0001 9 March
(Prepared by I & FW Detachment)

1. MAIN PROPAGANDA TRENDS: American tank spearheads were said to have reached the Rhine at Remagen, but no mention was made of Allied-reported crossings of the river at that point. It was acknowledged that the German front had been pressed back to the west bank of the Rhine between Dusseldorf and Cologne. Most German troops were said to have made their way safely across the river, thereby frustrating Allied plans to trap large forces on the west side.

Dr. Goebbels told the German people in his weekly editorial in Der Reich that the war had already passed its climax, he predicted that in the final and decisive stage now beginning the war would rise to unprecedented fury and that would stop abruptly, suggesting that the German armies in the east and west were not expecting to stabilize their fronts. Goebbels said that the battle lines would probably continue to fluctuate until the end of the war.

The "painful" loss of German territory was commented by Lt. Gen. Kurt Dittmer, who declared that the combined strategy of the Soviets and Anglo-Americans was confronting the German High Command with "difficult military problems."

Russian troops driving toward Berlin were reported to have reached Belsen, 28 miles from the Reichs capital. The Germans claimed the recapture of Luden in Hitler's "Hochwald.

   f. T.L.A. ACCUSES AMERICAN LANDING ON MAINLAND.

3. WESTERN FRONT: The advance of American tank spearheads to the west bank of the Rhine at Remagen was acknowledged in German reports, but they failed to announce the Allied-reported crossing of the river between Remagen and Koblenz, in the vicinity of Remagen.

Although it was admitted that the Allies were pushing steadily forward all along the front, most transmissions again pointed out that the pinions clawing on the central Rhine had not achieved its objective of trapping large numbers of German troops. Instead, they were said to be making their way safely across the Rhine to take up new defensive positions on the west bank. It was also pointed out that the struggle in the west had developed into a "battle of attrition" for the Allies, with new divisions constantly being brought up to replace others that had been worn out or destroyed (GB 0800; GPA 9100).

On the northern sector of the front, the Canadian First Army, British Second Army, and American Ninth Army were reported to have launched a combined attack to advance into the German bridgehead at Wesel. It was claimed, however, that in counterattacks German paratroopers had thrown back the Allied forces.

The situation in the central Rhine area was termed "critical" as the German front was pressed back to the eastern bank of the Rhine between Dusseldorf and Cologne. On the west side fighting was said to be continuing in Cologne, and the Allies were reported to have carried out heavy attacks against the German bridgehead at Remagen.

Tank spearheads were said to be leading the American advance to positions west of Koblenz on the Rhine at Remagen, but it was pointed out that since German formations had not followed up the tanks the operations in this sector could not be called a "breakthrough." Heavy fighting was noted in the Elbe Valley and in the Rhine-Moselle triangle.

As at the Oesvberger Hochwald, south of Trier, the Americans were reported. to have failed in attempts to relieve a battle group cut off by German troops, while in the Lower Vosges Allied attacks were claimed halted by German fire. (Allied fronts; GBS 1400, 1930, 2000; GPS 1000).

Allied "terror bombings" continued their attacks over Germany reportedly concentrated on Dussent, Gross Membrur and Liepaa. Fifty-nine Allied planes were reported destroyed (German enemy).

b. German Army Front: The war already had passed its climax and as it enters its final and decisive stage both sides are preparing for the furious employment of all available means to achieve victory, declared Dr. Goebbels in his weekly editorial appearing today in Des Reich. Virtually admitting that the German armies would not be able to hold their fronts in the east or west, Dr. Goebbels explained that the battle lines could not be expected to remain fixtly stationary, and on the contrary suggested that they would remain fluctuating until the end of the war. The end, he said, would come abruptly, after a series of "fierce" battles, and the victor would be "he that remains standing after the final round, even if he bleeds from a thousand wounds."

As a warning to persons in Germany now speculating on the necessity of the war, Dr. Goebbels asserted: "experience has taught us that it is not up to us to reason about the need for war. When it is due it comes with the force of a natural phenomenon and provides a blessed hour for the nations that want to make history."

Groping for factors that might turn the tide in favor of Germany, Goebbels harked back to his old theory that victory could not be won by nations that lacked "a definite war program. Allied principles and slogans were said to be lacking "according to the needs of the moment" rather than in accordance with a clear picture of the world's needs. "One may perhaps think that such a lack of spiritual and intellectual stimuli in the war effort may be balanced by material superiority," he stated, "but we have learned from the historical lessons of this war that that is impossible." (Dr. Hilt 1929; Trans-ocean des 1930).

The instability of the Allies to decide on "fixed war aims" was likewise viewed by Lt. Gen. Kurt Dittmer as a hopeful sign for eventual German success, and as a symbol of the waning moral strength of the Allies.

Assessing the military situation in the east and west, Dittmer acknowledged the "seriousness" of recent developments and stated that the loss of the great German territory was a "tragic event." He blamed Germany's unfavorable geographical position in the heart of Europe, where it was open to mass assaults from both sides by an east-west alliance system. The combined strategy of our eastern and western enemies is in effect ruling us constantly to shift our focal points and is presenting us with difficult military problems, said Dittmer.

On the eastern front, Dittmer noted with particular concern developments in the Stettin and Keric areas in the north and on the central front along the Oder, where Soviet attempts to enlarge the bridgehead were seen as the forerunner of further heavy battles. In the west, he admitted that the superiority of the Anglo-Americans in ground forces and air power enabled them to cross the Rhine, to open the door to Brussels and Cologne and to press forward to the edge of the Rhine itself. The only ray of hope in the west was in the Kurland and west Brussel areas, where German troops had prevented the Soviets from reaching their final objectives, said Dittmer, "but the west some promise was seen in the heavy losses suffered by the Allies and their inability to cut off large German forces on the west side of the Rhine." (DGB 1945).

(Note: Dittmer's speech, originally scheduled for Tuesday, was read for him last night by an unidentified announcer).

The failure of the Russians and the Anglo-Americans to capture or destroy the mass of German forces during recent advances was also highlighted by Dr. Evers in the weekday "Review of the Situation."

Emphasizing particularly Eisenhower's disappointment over not taking a large number of German prisoners, Dr. Edwards insisted that as a result Allied propaganda was forced once again as a "calamity" to stress the achievements of the Soviet armies in Pomerania and West Prussia. For a time, he said, Anglo-American military successes were played up to "overcome their defeat by Soviet Russia at Yalta," but this tendency has now been stopped.

Dr. Edwards pointed out that British and American offensives could not
The fate of Europe, because that would be determined entirely by the Kremlin unless German "will to live" proves an insurmountable obstacle.
Already, he declared, the Anglo-Americans felt the heel of Stalin's hosts in developments in Poland, Romania, Finland and Bulgaria (GHS 1239).

With the war now reaching Inner portions of Germany, the civilian population was asked to report immediately to the military if Allied tanks or vehicles suddenly make an appearance. Advice to civilians near the fronts was to obey quickly and keep calm; count vehicles accurately; note the direction; give the correct date and time of observation; send a written report to the military or Volksturmer (FBII Bull 15 1220).

A talk on the economic organization of Greater East Asia, in which Japan was hailed as the "richest country in the world," was delivered over the domestic radio by a Major Haejufld (GHS 1830).

Special bulletins over Radio Cologne announced that resistance and oil coupons had been stolen and warned dealers to report to the Wehrmacht or police if these coupons were presented. Numbers of all the stolen coupons were reported (GHS 2060, 2260).

(See para 4 for Section G, Eastern Front.)

C. Italian Front: The German communiqué said that there was a lull in fighting in Italy, and that American reconnaissance thrusts in the mountains area of Montes had remained unsuccessful.

The escape of General Nekto was said to have started a crisis in Italy, as the Bolsheviks seized on the issue to form demonstrations for pressuring the Italian government into taking more severe action against "nationalist" Italians. DNI said that the Kremlin was trying to force pacification in Italy through demonstrations. Moscow was using the escape of Nekto as a basis for claims of total power. In all the demonstrations, shooting and violence were described (FBII Bull 15 1716, 2260; GHS 0900).

Transocean stated that the Wilhelmsrots had said that Communists in Italy would take advantage of the escape. The Wilhelmsrots spokesman hinted that Nekto was in his way to Britain (Transocean Morse 1728).

D. Western Europe: Voice broadcasts, in addition to speaking about the miseries and suffering in France and Belgium, declared that there was always plenty of food in the barns for American officers. The transportation problem too, they said, wasn't serious enough to prevent adequate shipment of supplies for British and American officers' mess (GHS 0900, 1700).

E. Southeastern Europe: Press dispatches reported that the new government in Romania was made up of 14 members of the National Democratic Front, which they said was completely Bolshevik. But still the Kremlin was said not to be satisfied, and to be brewing another crisis. DNI said that Moscow believed that Yalta meant the complete elimination of the last trace of Fascism in Europe (FBII Bull 15 2220, 1600, 1125).

New clashes were reported between ELAS and Aristides, of which DNI said Moscow was already taking advantage. ELAS accused the government of not living up to the agreement made on 12 February, and said that the government was creating an anti-democratic police state (FBII Bull 15 1630, 2145; GHS 2100).

F. Pacific Front: The Japanese Prime Minister, General Koiso, told the new political party that in the present national crisis everything must be sacrificed for war, and that American landings on the Japanese homeland were very possible (FBII Bull 15 1669).

Transocean's correspondent Ernst Bamber reported that Japan expected an American landing on Japan at any time. He said that it was an American custom to launch attacks before finishing with the one already begun. An attack on Japan would be much more difficult than anything previously attempted by American forces, because in all other operations Japan had been hemmed in by submarine attacks and American air superiority. He spoke of the vast American naval forces south of Japan which might be trying to establish air bases between Japan and Taiwan. Such a move, he said, would cut off Taiwan, the central base for Japan's communications with her southern areas (Transocean Morse 1716).

There were no operational reports. On Leyte, the Japanese garrison was said to have been greatly reduced in number (GHS 0900).
c. Eastern Front: The mounting Soviet offensive along the Oder was said to have advanced in the center to within 20 miles of Berlin at Seelow.

To the south, in Silesia, the Germans claimed to have retaken Lebus just in time to frustrate new Soviet blows.

Truman's Armin Schwenberg said that fighting in the Oder bend area was marked by growing Russian efforts to capture the German bridgeheads on the east bank of the river and by German attempts to narrow the Russian wedge on the west bank.

The German hold on Großenhöfen to the north of Kustrin, was said to have been so pressed that it was now no more than a bridgehead, and under heavy Soviet fire. The Russians increased their pressure on Zohden after heavy artillery bombardment, and made three successive attacks on the bridgehead.

Schwenberg said that Russian attacks on Zohden, also on the right bank of the Oder, were accompanied by landing attempts to the south of the fortress and tank attacks against the south part of the city. Other reports said that some parts of the city were in flames, and that the Russians had been stopped only at the gates of the city.

Speaking of the most important Soviet advance in this area, the correspondent said that when the Russians had thrust from their base west of Gersitz a few days ago to points in the Seelow area, it had seemed then that the Russians might be able to move much force to the west, but now German counterattacks were regaining the ground. He said that extensive Russian deployment at Lebus had been broken up when the Germans regained control of the town. Such counterattacks were bleeding Soviet reserves white, he said (Transcript News 18:01).

Further to the south, fighting in Silesia was said to have remained about the same, but all reports featured the liberation of Lebus, which, they said, had been taken from strong Soviet tank and infantry forces. German counterattacks in this area were claimed to have reverted to some extent on Soviet breakthroughs (GFS 18:30; GFS 21:00).

In Pomerania, most fighting continued to be northwest of Stargard, where the Soviet forces advanced from their base bridgehead near Zillen, the Russians attacked after a heavy artillery barrage. Other Soviet attacks were launched against Kammin and Döllnitz but were met by Volksgrenadiers and German sailors. The Luftwaffe was reported to have taken active part in the ground fighting in this area (GFS 18:30, 22:00).

In east Russia and the Leningrad area, Russian forces were attacking on both sides of Lohes, and advancing towards Lenzing, further to the north, with very strong tank and infantry forces. The city of Gusev was admitted to have fallen to "overwhelming" force (GFS 21:00; GFS 18:22; German conque). East Russia was identified only to say that uncoordinated Russian thrusts west of Zinnow had been repelled.

In Slovakia, the Russian 10-Day fight to enter the Alpschul Valley was admitted to have made some progress by costly advances which had brought them to both sides of Schmöritz (German conque).

1. German Domestic Propaganda

a. Death to Traitors: In a special order issued as a supplement to the announcement publicized throughout the day in domestic voice broadcasts and releases for the home areas, it was announced that all towns must be held to the last and that commandants who surrender them to the enemy will be sentenced to death.

The order, signed by Chief of the Volkssturm High Command Keitel, SS Reichsfuehrer Hermann Goebbels, declared that the Allies are attempting to convert German cities to surrender by the disintegration of false news over the radio or through special agents. Their object is to impress alien commandants and the population with the deplorable destruction of advanced tank spearheads and to threaten destruction of a town if it fails to surrender.

This new Allied "trick" will fail, it was stated, because every German city will be defended with every possible means and will not be declared an "open city" except in rare cases determined by the Fuehrer. The battle commandants of every town are to be held personally responsible for carrying out this order. If they act contrary to this solemn duty and task, they will be sentenced to death along with all civilians officials who have tried to steer them from their duty or who have prevented them from fulfilling their duty.

Implementing this new decree, the communiques carried the report that General Leach, commander of the Nuremberg "Fortress," has been sentenced to death by firing for his "cowardly surrender to the enemy." It was stated that his family will likewise be held responsible.

b. National Resistance: An appeal for national resistance by all Germans before and behind the Allied lines was made by Dr. Goebbels in his weekly editorial in Das Reicht which will appear today. The only way to keep the enemy from carrying his march through Germany is to coerce him in countless small battles, said Goebbels, and these calls for daring and courage and a willingness to "offer our own lives to change and if necessary to sacrifice them."

"Only our stubborn resistance can save the country," declared Goebbels. "There are no other ways or means...we are the front there are towns which have held out for two months against enemy attacks and they have caused the enemy casualty until now. If every German town does the same, it will be impossible for the enemy to advance further."

Courageous resistance by strong-hearted men and women can bring about miracle, Goebbels asserted. The enemy to employ reinforcements and to leave large numbers of troops behind during his advance, and thereby seriously reducing his effective reserves of men and materiel. "The enemy employs his terror with great risk because he does not believe he need bother about resistance. This is our chance. It is not sufficient to face the enemy passively, but it will be necessary to coerce him actively. He must be shown cold contempt and weapons must be used against him...all of us must take on work that we would sooner die fighting to the last breath than to carry the yoke of slavery."

Several items in domestic broadcasts attempted to show that the German people are handling Goebbels' advice. One reported that the "Nationale Freiheits-Flieger" carried out a bold attack against the headquarters of General de Tassigny, commander of the First French Army, and another quoted an English commentator on the effectiveness of the Volkssturm in disrupting Allied supply lines. In defense of civilians participating in attacks against Allied military forces, a BBC dispatch pointed out that they are only seeking to protect themselves against the terrorist destruction wrought by Anglo-American troops.

A panel in "The Mirror of the Times" program described how young girls in the Oberbruch were assisting in the resistance by helping refugees and seeking and acting as clerks for the Volkssturm. Details of all that can be offered by all civilians were presented in a BBC transmission which urged civilians to observe all movements of the enemy—his strength and situation, the terrain in which he is operating, roads and railways available and barricades he may on and to report those facts clearly and distinctly to the nearest military com-

a. Decline of British. Goebbels admitted in his editorial that in view of recent heavy losses of ground in the east, southeast and west, hope for contin-unence of the "Brave German resistance" had declined. He said the decisive stage of the "final stage"--of the war has started, and that Germany must realize that if only alternatives are victory or death without glory. "The war cannot last very much longer," Goebbels declared, and we are now confronting our last and great-

d. Allied Internal Differerfences: Erich Godeschey in the mid-way "Review of tSituation" described the Allied "inner-political differences which have always, exists and now have a new in the world." He devoted considerable time to Sevin's criticism of Churchill and predicted that the Labor Party in England will not cooperate with the Conservatives because it was seeking power. Thus, Beria was gradually revealing the war guilt of British foreign policy, and was admitted what Germany had said from the beginning: that the first day of the war were fighting in self-defense of their right to live. Churchill, according to Sevin, bore the main guilt of this war, "Churchill's war," and his fingers were raised "with the blood of the hundreds of thousands who have died.

Godeschey took his cue for an attack on British plutocracy from a statement by Trade Unionist Deputy Leader of the Labor Party, Arthur Greenwood, who attacked the government on the "framing of their own future in London without regard for the future of the English people." This merely substantiated what Germany knew all along; Godeschey boasted: Germany sought in self-defense against the Jewishplutocratic gentlemen typical of London and Wall Street, who had made a pact with Bolshevikism. Germany was being prevented from making great social progress by the Rothschilds, Barones and Morganists, who realized that German progress would be a bad example for British and American farmers and workers. The German racial had taken upon itself only to defend their right to live -- to create a healthy, social and political order in Europe. The U.S. could expect 20,000,000 U.S. citizens to strike, demonstrations and general disorder after the war, according to the American sources. This was highly indicative of the "unlimited chauvinism" of the war criminals in London and Washington.

Furthermore, Herbert Hoover had predicted World War III as a growing possibildue to the differences among the major three Allies. How could Anglo-American city states of another world war, Godeschey inquired, and still maintain when Germany is an aggressor nation. The Allies began this war, and now intend to exterminate Germany and bring to Europe chaos and destruction.

Godeschey briefly mentioned this theme in his weekly article. Germany's enemies were under great pressure and were compelled at this time to either quickly, or not at all. The Allied coalition "suffers from internal differences" and is held together with great effort only by military success and the hope of a speedy victory."

f. Misery in Allied-Occupied Europe: Reports of a typhus epidemic in Frankfurt on Main were credited to the United Press. The Allied authorities were accused of confusing the "hunger and starvation disease" to the civilian population which now had to live in the open fields. While their homes were burned down, German doctors were called upon, but only for the American soldiers stricken with the disease.

The London Observer was quoted as saying that military successes had not check-ed the British people who were apprehensive of a black future for the chaotic Euro-Godeschey also devoted a few sentences to the misery brought by the Allies to Europe. His major point was that Germany could have prevented such a future for Europe, and he's even taken steps to do so, but the Allied "war criminals" had not permitted him to finish the work.

f. Bolshevization of Europe: Transmissions to the home press gave considerable prominence to the role played by the Soviet Union in present and future European affairs. The disappearance of the 15 Polish exile-politicians was attributed to the Soviets "and their bestial methods." The newly 25-year military ence between Jugoslavia (Tito) and the Soviet Union was claimed to be War-Time Simplification: An evening talk by a Dr. Schmidt described German flexibility in adopting itself to war conditions. He first reminded his audience of the airs-item and how Germans had risen to the occasion, and then the refusal problem which was new in kind. His conclusion had been made effective, he announced, which eliminated private local procedures, saving power, time, and personnel; made it possible for soldiers really to dictate their wills to commanders; and authorized refusal to address themselves to any Reichs court, since local courts had now been superseded by general courts.

Military: Demands of new Allied aims in the west marked domestic operational fronts, but it was asserted that German troops are resisting at every point where it is possible to slow the Anglo-American advance. It was asserted that the Americans had moved forward to the south of Koenigsberg and further south had pushed in Ohrdruf, where heavy battles were still raging. Heavy fighting was reported taking place at the defense ring around Brunswick, but the Americans had already advanced further to the east on either side of the town. The British were attacking south of Lauenburg and in the west had taken Emschendorf, Bremen in the Ruhr was lost and street fighting was continuing in Essen. The Allied advance was allowed between the Harz and the Ruhr, but a strong attack was launched southeast of Brunswick.

The liberation of Crailsheim was hailed in the "Front Reports" program, and in a special statement from the city a commentator described the merciless treatment of German civilians by American troops. It was claimed that women had been raped and corpses, belongings, furniture and other goods had been stolen.

The loss of Koenigsburg was acknowledged in east front reports. Heavy fighting was still going on in Vienna, but the Soviets had expanded their influence towards the northeast. The defenders of Breslau likewise were still holding out.

In Italy, strong British forces supported by artillery and fighter-bombers were said to have crossed the Drava, but it was claimed they were thrown back to the east bank of the river. British troops also were reported to have landed at the southwest bank of Lake Como.

German Forces

a. Military: No morning broadcasts to the Wehrmacht were heard for the eighth consecutive day. The evening 2100 program carried a more detailed western front report than usual. The situation in the Rhineland area and in the center of the Reich was reported to be extremely critical, but German defensive successes had held up Allied advances. At Brunswick and in the Harz Mountains sectors several Allied formations were wiped out, while at Erfurt they had been brought to a halt. Allied air-borne landings on both sides of Berlin were reported, along with gains of ground. Attempts to cross the Ruhr were again frustrated.

On the western front the Soviets were pressuring eastern Vienna and heavy battles were in progress. Airer attacks took place between the Drava and the Vienna Woods. All Soviet attacks on Vienna were recalled. The surrender of Koenigsburg was now announced by "illegal German officers." In Italy the German forces maintained their positions in the Adriatic sector "in spite of heavy enemy pressure."

b. Political: The report carried in the German Communiqué on the surrender of Koenigsburg was reported to the Forces. The "c word" (communism) was condemned as a traitor, and the forces were told to resist all the harder because the people of the Reich had to show that the Reds were a commoner was not representative of the German Army. Such an incident could not happen again, they were warned.

Briefing items to the forces included: the report that the Spanish Government had broken off diplomatic relations with Japan; the announcement that Bernard Baruch, "the Jew," was now in the Reich to carry out plans for the economic decision of Germany; and two news reports -- Eden's confirmation in Germany that a $2 billion German slave to the Soviet Union had been discussed at Yalta, and second--a suggestion that the 20,000,000 American unemployed in the post-war period predicted by American Mercury be sent to the Soviet Union instead of German slaves later, an idea that would not even be considered by the Allies because they had the enslavement of Germany in mind.

3. German Propaganda For Europe

a. West Front: Max Frull said that there was no longer a west or east front because the fighting was now taking place in the north and south. He said the German and Elbe were in constant danger, and should the Allies link up, Germany would be in the greatest possible danger.

Other dispatches said that there was no longer a western front in the old sense, but rather a two-sided front which ran along the northern coastal plain to the Elbe, and the southern front which prevented the Allies from advancing into southern Germany. A central front would be recreated should the Allies hold a large bridgehead on the Elbe.

Allied efforts on the northern front were said to be directed at cutting the coastal area into numerous bridgeheads. For this reason, it was of greatest importance to prevent the capture of Bremen, Emden, and other ports situated along the coast as far north as Stettin.

British and Canadian drives in the north were said to have made only small gains. The Canadians advanced south of Dover, and thrust towards Amelhehn. The British made an all-out attack in the direction of Clonemara which carried them into Wales. Another attack around Campsdon was prevented from going further north. From Harpstad, the British strongly attacked towards Bremen without important gains. Generally, the Germans were said to have won a defensive success in the northern sector.

The objectives of the Allied "flanking front" were said to be the cities of Bayreuth, Nuremberg, and Stuttgart. Although intensified fighting was expected, this front press reports claimed that the recapture of Grailheim and slow Allied advances in the Necker and Koberleb sector were used indications for Germany.

The Ruhr area was said to be a "fottress of its own" where Allied concentrations from the north had forced fierce fighting in Essen and Hamm. The reports stressed that three Allied forces were tied up here, and that supply problems were increased by German occupation of the area.

b. East Front: Press reports speculated that there was a strong possibility of Russian offensives to split Germany south of Berlin by linking up with American forces. German air reconnaissance was said to have seen vast Soviet activity behind the frontal line at Golen and Frankfort, while military activity at Stettin and Kuesstrin was noted to be confined only to lively reconnaissance. These developments were said to greatly hinder German defense.

Russian pressure towards St. Petersburg increased considerably. In Vienna, the Germans were said to be fighting in the Weiner Altstadt and on the Danube Canal in bloody street battles. The Russians were trying to encircle the city from the east with 20 infantry divisions and two motorized corps which were said to be concentrated in the area of their large bridgehead between the Donau and the March.

Their objective is to impress German commandants with the deep penetration of advanced tank spearheads and to threaten destruction of a town if it fails to surrender.

This new Allied "trick" will fail, it was stated, because every German city will be defended with every possible means and "will not be declared an "open city" except in rare areas determined by the High Command. c. Decline of Foes: Goebbels admitted in his editorial that in view of recent heavy losses of men in the west, southwest and west, hope for continuance of the "heavy German resistance" had declined. He said the decisive stage—the "final stage"—of the war has started, and that Germany must realize that its only alternatives are victory or death without glory. "The war cannot last very much longer," declared Goebbels, and we are now confronting our last and greatest difficulty. "I know definitely that the Führer will find a way out of the dilemma and that only in this manner can we justify our military efforts. The decision of the war will not be reached until one second before twelve."

d. Allied Internal Differences: Brit glittered in the middle "Review of the Situation" described the Allied "inner-political differences which have always existed and now have come out in the open." He devoted considerable time to the question of the Hoover-which Churchill and predicted that the Labor Party in England would not cooperate with the Conservatives because it was making policy. Thus, Britain was gradually revealing the war guilt of British foreign policy, and was admitting that Germany had been given the basic principles of the Liberalism. Britain was being prevented from making great social progress by the Rothschilds, Balfour, and Kerensky, who realized that German success would be a bad example for British and American farmers and workers. The U.S. could expect 20,000,000 unemployed, strikes, demonstrations and general disorder after the war, according to the American Mercury. This was highly indicative of the "unlimited cycling" of the war criminals in London and Washington.

Now under Anglo-American secession of another world war, Goebbels intimated, and still maintain that Germany is an aggressor nation. The Allies began this war, and now intend to exterminate Germany and bring to Eur no class and destruction.

Goebbels briefly acknowledged this theme in his weekly article. Germany's enemies were under great pressure and were compelled at this time to either conquer quickly, or not at all. Aided at Germany in the event of a future war. Turkey was soon to be confronted with the following three demands by the Soviets: (a) retaking of Turkey's control over the Bosphorus; (b) ceding of a strip of the Armenian, including there;
(c) democratization of Turkey's constitution. The Turks had been deadlocked into such a deal, it was claimed, and would henceforth be blackmailed by the Russians.

2. War-Time Simplification: An evening talk by Dr. Schwan described German flexibility to adjust itself to war conditions. No first realized his audience of the anti-war and how Germans had risen to the occasion, and then the reduced problem which was now in hand. Now regulations had been made effective, local courts had been approved by the general courts.

3. Military: Admission of new Allied gains in the west marked domestic operational reports, but it was asserted that German forces are pressing at every point where it is possible to slow the Anglo-American advance. It was acknowledged that the Americans had pressed forward to the south of Caserta, and further south had pushed into Calabria, where heavy battles were still raging. Heavy fighting was reported to be taking place at the defense ring around Brunswick, but the Americans had already advanced further to the east on either side of the town. The British were attacking south of Messina and had driven port of Messina and Taranto.
Sicilian in the north was lost and street fighting was continuing in famed. The Allied advance was aimed at between the Maritza Forest and the radio, but a strong attack was launched southeast of Burgundy.

The liberation of Crete was hailed in the "Front Report" column, and in a special statement from the city's commander described the "heroic" treatment of German civilians by British troops. It was claimed that women had been raped and men, prisoners, retards and other women had been stolen.

The loss of Crete was acknowledged in east front reports. Heavy fighting was still going on in Italy, but the Britons had expanded their operations toward the northeast. The defenders of Crete likewise were still holding out.

In Italy, strong British forces supported by artillery and fighter-bombers were said to have crossed the Rubicon, but it was denied they were thrown back to the coast line of the river. British troops also were reported to have landed at the southwest bank of Lake Como.

2. German Forces

a. Military: No morning broadcasts to the Reich were heard for the sixth consecutive day. The evening 2100 program carried a more detailed western front report than usual. The situation in the Ruhr-Bielefeld area near the center of the Reich was reported to be extremely critical, but German defensive successes had held up Allied advance. At Brunswick, in the Aokia front lines sudden Allied formation were wiped out, while at Erfurt they had been brought to a halt. Allied aircraft bombings on both sides of Wiesbaden were reported.
Thus, with gains of cr Texas, attempts to cross the Ruhr were made frustrate.
On the western front the Soviet were construction desert into Vienna and heavy battles were in progress. German attacks took place between the Danube and the Vienna Woods. All Soviet attacks on Eberswalde were repulsed. The coming of Koenigshaven was now announced by "local German officials." In Italy the German forces maintained their positions in the Adriatic sector "in spite of heavy enemy pressure."

b. Political: The report carried in the German Gemische in the surrender of Koenigshaven was repeated in the press. The "current cabinet" was denounced as a traitor, and the force were told to resist all the harder because the people of the Reich had to be shown that the Koenigshaven cabinet was not representative of the German Army. Such an initiative would not happen again, they were promised.

Better items to the force included: the report that the Soviet Government had broken off diplomatic relations with Japan; the announcement that Bernard Baruch, "the Jew," was now in the Reich to carry out plans for the economic destruction of Germany; and two news reports — Eden's confirmation in Germany that the sending of German slaves to the Soviet Union had been discussed at Yalta, and the suggestion that the 20,000,000 American, unemployed in the post-war Period predicted by American Mercury be sent to the Soviet Union instead of German slave labor, an idea that would not even be considered by the Allies because they had the enslavement of Germany in mind.

3. German Situation for Europe

a. East Front: MacEoin said that there was no longer a west or east front because the fighting was now taking place in the north and south. He said the Oder and the Elbe were in constant danger, and should the Allies link up, Germany would be in the greatest possible danger.

Other victories said that there was no longer a western front in the old sense, but rather a two-sided front which ran along the northern coastal plain to the Elbe, and the southern front which prevented the Allies from advancing into southern Germany. A central front should be reopened so that the Allies would be held by the Elbe.

Allied efforts in the northern front were said to be directed at cutting the coastal area into numerous bridgeheads. For this reason, it was of greatest importance to prevent the capture of Bremen, Emden, and other ports situated along the coast as far east as Stettin.

British and Canadian drives in the north were said to have made only small gains. The Canadians advanced south of Deventer, and thrust towards Almeln. The British made an all-out attack in the direction of Cleves where they carried them to Werl. Another attack around Arnsbro was prevented for a color further north. From Harlingen, the British strongly attacked towards Bremen without important gains. Generally, the Germans were said to have won a defensive success in the northern sector.

The objectives of the Allied "flanking front" were said to be the cities of Bayreuth, Nurnberg, and Stuttgart. Although intensive Allied fighting was expected in this front area, reports claimed that the capture of Gruelle and the Allied advances in the Ruhr and Kassel areas were not indications for Germany.

The Ruhr area was said to be a "battleship of its own" where Allied penetrations from the north had forced fierce fighting in Bremen and Emden. The reports stressed that these Allied forces were tied up here, and that supply problems were increased by German occupation of the area.

b. East Front: From reports speculated that there was a strong possibility of Russian offensives to split Germany south of Berlin by linking up with American forces. German air reconnaissances were said to have found great Soviet activity behind the front in Hanover and Pomerania, while military activity at Stettin and Kustrin was noted to be composed only of lively reconnaissance. These developments were said to greatly hinder German defense.

Russian pressure towards St. Petersburg increased considerably. In Vilna, the Germans were said to be fighting in the town Altstadt and on the Dnepr Canal in bloody street battles. The Russians were trying to encircle the city from the east with 20 infantry divisions and two motorized corps which were said to be concentrated in the area of their large bridgeheads between the Dnepr and the March.

1. German Domestic Propaganda

a. Roosevelt - War Criminal: The sudden death of President Roosevelt brought forth howls of accusation from the German Propaganda Ministry as innumerable tales, editorials, skits, and short items denouncing Roosevelt as an arch war criminal filled weekday broadcasts and transmissions to the German press. This tirade was initiated by the daily "Review of the Situation" which, for the first time in months, was delivered by an unidentified speaker.

The late President had not a just one, the speaker observed, because he had brought this war. "The constant war criminal of all times," in whose conscience lay the guilt of millions of dead soldiers and murdered women and children, had finally been caught up with by Fate. The commentary gave a brief review of what he termed "Roosevelt's systematic proportion for this war ever since 1937." With the help of lies (the promise to American mothers and the advice of Jewish friends), Roosevelt had turned money into American products and then convinced the U. S. of the necessity of turning an economic war against "an industrious nation and people (Germany) who dare think solely of their own security and existence."

But Roosevelt was successful in creating the psychological conditions for a declaration of war, and simultaneously assuring the presidency for life. The Land-Lenin act, the arming of merchant vessels, and finally the sinking of German ships, all built up to the desired climax in December 1941. The dollars of the Jewish war creditors been rolling in--the arch war criminal had realized his ambition.

The numerous spectators then explained the death of the President as a retributive act of God, as opposed to Hitler's scheme from October 20 July 1944, which the speaker also considered as indicative of divine intervention. "Fate saved the Fuehrer, although it ended his life against him. But it killed the other one, incomparably but justly!"

Broadcastary reports were contained in countless fireproof transmissions as well. The "Mirror of the Times" called the late President "a destroyer of life and happiness." On the one hand: the German people hard working, clean of character and its member of fighting. On the other: President Roosevelt with his metal, science and merchandise. "The swivel must die!"

Perhaps the most intense outburst of derision appeared in an editorial for the home front which presented a highly colored biographical sketch heavily laden with anti-Semitic. Labeling Mr. Roosevelt the "Messiah of International Jewish High Financiers," the sketch went so far as to point out that when Roosevelt contracted infantile paralysis in 1929, "a German physician saved his life." Nobody in the world would shed a tear for him, the report concluded, except international Jewry which would mourn the death of its "abolition antioxidant."

b. New Strength To Fight On: While most German transmissions found occasion to heap abuse on Mr. Roosevelt, a few saw in his passing further reason for the German people to continue its resistance. The monthly political review declared that in the President's death, the Germans could find the justification of their conviction to hold out because that may. "Fate, which many of us already thought to be unjust and incomparable, has shown itself as the irresistible guile for world events." The brave and confident persistence of the Reich had finally been rewarded.

If one could deny that the President's passing was of greatest importance to world events, and to the Allied coalition. But it wasn't Germany's worry how the Allies coped with their problems, although the people of the Reich awaited the decisions. The occasion of Mr. Roosevelt's death had a historical parallel. In the Seven Years War when Frederick the Great was confronted with a hopeless situation, Fate rewarded him with the death of the Tsarina Elisabeth--and the turning point of the war. The German people had historic faith. It would have been just as incomparable to them for Fate to have deprived the Reich of the Fuehrer as to have deprived him of victory. But that was impossible in view of the hard war, confirmed integrity of the German people. Justice still reigned in the world. It was up to the German people to take advantage of the opportunity.
President Roosevelt's death "is a great encouragement to all Germans to fight on fanatically."

c. Fuel For Hate: A new story of terrorization by 100 American Negro troops in the small town of Iphofen in the east of Franconia was published by the BBC News Service and the domestic radio to add fuel to the hate occasion against the Nazi-American conquerors.

Undoubtedly because it had been declared a hostilized town, Iphofen was desolated by the Negroes, who were the first Americans to enter. They plundered warehouses and houses, cut drunk en snatches liquor and then proceeded systematically from house to house raping 170 young girls, women, hospital nurses and even children, according to alleged eye-witness reports. The fact that the "conquest" was reported for several days was taken as an indication that a mocking officer's made an attempt to restrain the troops.

Similar reports of outrages committed by Allied occupation forces come from Crailsheim, where a correspondent described looting, killing and destruction carried out by the Americans, and from the area north of Stuttgart, where the French were said to have assembled civilian populations in the center of several towns and then to have gone through the houses taking watches, cameras, mirrors, pictures and any other valuable objects.

d. Berlin Front: The domestic radio publicized a report from the London Daily Telegraph affiriming that the Wehrmacht already is preparing for fanatical last resistance at certain focal points. The French ports and islands off the French coast, islands in the Azores Sea, the Ruhr district and the German-held sector of Holland were mentioned as "fortresses" that would be defended to the bitter end.

Evidence that German soldiers are willing to continue resistance even behind the Allied lines was offered by the BBC News Service. Reports were cited of "hundreds of soldiers" fighting at the rear of the Anglo-American front, carrying out dangerous and difficult operations. Another sign of fanaticism was seen in the uncensoring political bulletins of German civilians, who, in most cases have refused to fill political jobs in the Allied occupation government.

3. Allied Troubles: Further curtailments in the American food ration were attributed to a misallocation of the length of the war, and it was pointed out that the food reduction was one of the heavy sacrifices which the Americans have been forced to make. It was reported that people in the United States will receive less meat, butter, cheese, fish, sugar and tinned foods during the summer months and that the shortage of food continues even after the termination of the war.

Other Allied difficulties cited in home broadcasts were the impending crisis in the British government as a result of the fight between Conservatives and the Labor Party; the gloomy outlook for the San Francisco conference in view of increasing dissension among the United Nations and the minor role assigned to the smaller nations; and the loss of interest in War Bond's in the United States, with everyone attempting to sell them as quickly as possible.

f. West Front: Stating frankly that the situation in the west has grown more acute for the German forces, domestic broadcasts told of new Allied advances deep into the heart of Germany. The heaviest battles were reported taking place at Hitlerberg on the Elbe, 60 miles west of Berlin. Farther south, the Americans were said to be attacking the city of Marburg. Between the Elbe and Weser, the British had advanced to the area of Friesoythe, 15 miles west of Oldenburg. In the sector of the southeastern foothills of the Harz and the Saale River, the Americans drove a deep wedge into the German defenses, penetrating to the Eisleben-Wittenfels-Jena line and capturing Lower. The Americans also gained ground in their advance towards the Upper Main between Lichtenfels and Hassfurt, crossing the river after heavy fighting southeast of Hassfurt.

g. East Front: Operational reports from the east front were sparse. The fall of Vienna was not admitted, the communiques and other reports to the home front insisting that street fighting was continuing in the Austrian capital. There was no significant activity at the Oder front, but the Russians were still preparing for their impending large-scale attack toward Berlin. A new attack was also expected in Silesia at the same time.
Italy: The large scale British attack in Italy was extended southwest of Lake Comano and east to the area below Imola. Throwing in "unusual masses of material," the British were able to cross the Eastern River northwest of Lugo, according to the communiqué.

1. Climax News In Far East: One Berlin item carried the unusual statement that "events in East Asia show that the war in which our heavily-fighting ally is engaged is moving toward its altitudes." Japan was said to be doing everything possible to improve its chances in the final phase, and it was pointed out that both the Japanese and United States fleets are ready to "come out and fight."

2. German Forces

a. Military: The evening broadcast to theehment contained as its report on the western and eastern fronts an almost verbatim reading of the communiqué as well as a few operational items culled from the day's front reports.

b. Political: In the case with most home service broadcasts, the forces, too, were given a biographical survey of Mr. Roosevelt following the announcement of his death and the rendering of President Truman's declaration. The late President was described as having prorogued Japan into attacking the U. S., and of having made alliances with Japan and Stalin. He started this war to put the U. S. out of inextricable difficulties and the great ambition of his life was made known by himself when, returning from Yalta, "the voice of himself as the future world president." But the brain that did not know any limits collapsed. Roosevelt wanted to outmatch Germany and Japan, but those two nations continued to live—while he died. Into the Führer's life, but not beyond. Roosevelt. The German soldiers should have faith in their future.

Brief report to the former included a Reuters report that the San Francisco conference would probably be restored; the assertion that Italian workers were being deported to the Soviet Union; comments from a turned German prisoner of war on the miserable conditions existing in France; and quotations from the German press reporting reports of debates in the House of Commons during which the enslavement of Germany was openly discussed.

3. German Preparations For Europe

a. Roosevelt's Tragedy: In comparison with the vilification campaign against the late American president and his successor which was carried on throughout the day in all domestic programs, BUF press dispatches for the outside world were remarkably restrained. They tended rather to factual reporting, and to the interpretation that Roosevelt's death had made it easier for the Führer to expand its policies. The new President was characterized as unable to meet the great events facing him in matters of foreign policy. It was said that now not even Stettinius would be able to proceed to the Conference with any clear ideas in mind, and that it was probable that Truman wouldn't go to the Conference.

One dispatch elaborated the theme that Roosevelt had been a sick man for a very long time, and that it had been a tragedy for the world that "this man with his insane ideas" should have become President to lead his nation into this war from which it would only emerge in depression and social revolt.

b. Military: The area of Coblenz—Siegfeld—Arenos was said to be the scene of very heavy fighting stretching all the way to the German Elbe bridgeshead around Mittelsperre. The bridges over the Elbe in this area had been destroyed by the Germans. Strong American tank formations were reported deploying in the area of Luneburg, and increased fighting from this region to the Elbe was anticipated.

American tank forces were said to be concentrated against Isselburg, and strong thrusts north and south of the city were expected. Heavy American air attacks were unable to enhance the situation around Schauenburg and the Lake.

British and Canadian attacks in Holland and north Germany were reported to have captured Deventer and Eilen, but to have been held up in the Ijssel sector and in the area between the Ems and the Weser where they were unable to reassert territory lost yesterday. The battle around Bremen was reaching a peak, but so far German infantry and armoured units with strong flak screens were holding off sacrificial British attacks. They said that the arrival of British reinforcements would bring new assaults. One BBC dispatch said that the British, after artillery preponderance, entered Essen.

The American Third Army was reinforced by units from the Ninth and the First Armies, DNS reported. One thrust aimed at Halle had already reached Schweinhausen.
Another drive to the south had crossed the Unstrut at Wiich, and now the fighting was said to be raging on the western bank of the Saale in the area of Naumburg, but were unable to cross the river. Other formations entered Saalfeld and Pegau to engage strong German forces before Halle. A third strong American force drove for Zeltz, and south of Jena were able to establish another bridgehead on the western bank of the Saale.
To the south between the Neckar and the Rhine, the most critical area was said to be south of Karlsruhe, where the French moved against Baden-Baden with tank units which were tied up in fighting within the city.

1. German Domestic Propaganda

a. Roosevelt's Blueprint for Joy: President Roosevelt's death still provided Germany propagandists with their main theme, as they continued to attack him as the "criminal beyond the grave" who carried with him to the final judgment responsibility for the death of millions of men, women, and children.

Throughout the day, in keycommentaries, voice broadcasts and dispatches for the domestic press, the late President was labeled the world's leading war criminal whose manipulations brought about the start of the war and "pulled so many nations and peoples into a great sea of blood." The blunt statement of this line was offered by the evening speaker, Hans Fritzsche, when he declared: "We have to state categorically that there would have been no European war without Roosevelt; indeed, there would have been no World War at all."

In the face of this mountain of abuse heaped upon Mr. Roosevelt, Fritzsche blandly stated: "It is not our task and not typical of our character to insult an opponent who has been killed by fate. Thus, there has not been a single word of insult directed against the dead President either on the German radio or in the German press."

Pointing an accusing finger at Roosevelt for bringing bomb toner to German cities, killing hundreds of thousands of soldiers and civilians, and destroying a culture centuries old, Fritzsche asserted that these crimes piled before his repeated refusal to accept the path of peace so frequently offered by the Fuehrer.

Fritzsche carefully traced the steps by which the war-monger Roosevelt inexcusably dragged the world into war. He accused the United States, turned against Germany in a provoking speech in 1937, concluded private pacts with the powers of Europe and, under the cloak of neutrality, delivered lend-lease to Britain, aided Soviet Russia, sent troops to Iceland and finally, in his last act before actual warfare, ordered the U. S. Navy to attack German submarines.

Attributing the President's sudden death to fate rather than coincidence, Fritzsche asked: "Does it not serve as a real warning to others who are equally guilty?"

DNI press dispatches likewise singled out the President as "the driving power of the war," one item claiming that he was forced to take the United States to war to solve the unemployment problem and starvation at home and the great social questions that confronted him. In another transmission it was claimed that Roosevelt had been obliged to bring about the war as a service to his Jewish-Plutocratic associates who saw in it their greatest opportunity for large dividends.

Interspersed among the propaganda attacks against the President were numerous factual statements over the home radio and in DNI transmissions reporting funeral plans, oraments of the world press and the inauguration of the new American President Harry S. Truman.

b. A Testament Of Misery: In the seedy political review, Dr. Otto Brielch chided the millions of people throughout the world who mourned the "uniquely" passing of Mr. Roosevelt before he had the opportunity to complete his plans for lasting peace. Even now, stated Dr. Brielch, it is obvious that these plans were not leading to world peace, but instead to "immeasurable misery and world chaos," signs of which already could be seen in suffering Europe. Those who had looked to the American President for formulation of a world Peace Organization, for the delivery of large stocks of food to Europe and for improvement of the health of the European nations had realized even before his death that those objectives would never be met. For in reality, Roosevelt's primary objective was his "unscrupulous plan for Jewish-Plutocratic world domination," and he intended to head over to Bolshevism all parts of the world in which he was not personally interested.

The Roosevelt-Churchill deception of securing Europe was described in a report from the Swiss newspaper Schweizer Illustrierte Zeitung quoted by DNI and the home radio. It allegedly stated that the "liberators" who promised "freedom from want" suddenly found there were not enough ships to bring food to Europe, so that the occupied countries were now suffering “hunger and chaos.”

The British press was said to have realized that German resistance has increased. The Westminster Guardian reported that the Germans are developing strong defenses inside Germany; Reuters said that the Germans have developed new blocking positions and a victory might not be expected; and the Daily Mirror quoted, cited this statement by a captured German, although Germany is winning the war. The Anglo-Americans are found to attempt to conquer Germany.

8. The Penalty of Betrayal: A new story from Wittersham on the Elbe served to illustrate the determination of German leaders to punish by death all “traitors” who are accused to surrender to the enemy. The story carried in the domestic “Front Reports” column, follows: On August Dr. Stamer, a teacher in the streets of Wittersham, was killed by his own people. He was searched, and on his was found American identity cards and letters for the surrender of the city which also involved the mayor of Bremen. The mayor and Dr. Stamer were immediately brought before a mob and sentenced to death. The story ends with the remark that they were both executed and thus found their just punishment.

Every German should be ashamed of these two men, who are traitors to their people, traitors to our cause, traitors to the soldiers who were killed on the battlefields by honor.

9. Slave Labor Market: The German government pleads to Allied plans to deport German slave labor to the Soviet Union were stimulated further by reports of the heavy loss Soviet industries to the U. S. Gromeko who reported the condition of one concentration camp at Yalta. According to Gromko, the Soviet Union is anxious to acquire all German prisoners from the U. S. Great Britain and the Dominions “as soon as possible,” particularly since there would be no opposition from the American unions, whose interests such an action would serve. He was told to have heard on the front about the “new American "economic circle"” that German prisoners in the U. S. might influence American workers by stating that no such force existed in the Soviet Union. Berlin’s comment on this was that the Germans would have little opportunity to do anything in the labor camps of Siberia.

10. Occupation Crisis: Front reports concerned with “rapes, rape, and the deplorable methods” of the western Allies were carried on here throughout the day. At the same time, it was said, the Würmacht were making “the army” very uncomfortable to the Anglo-American troops in the Reich.

Two press releases reported that in the Baltic of the Wittenburg, the Allies had executed a French prisoner after a night in Wittenburg. In another German village, unnamed, French troops deported all young men. These who resisted were shot.

11. East Front: The situation in the east was described as follows: The main points of the fighting were in the central and industrial regions of the Reich. The Americans were expending at the Elbe one at the Silesia, at the confluence of which two rivers on American bridgehead was formed. The second strong attack on that bridgehead failed, but the Americans advanced further north and southeast. Reconnaissance units reached the Silesia at Elbe and both sides of Silesia, 12 miles south of Locarno; other similar troops reached Berdemark and Dona. Advance forces to the south fought their way to Rudolstadt and Suhl. In the Thuringian Forest the Allies were attacked by intense fighting. Heavy fighting took place in the Säben Triangle at Elberose, where American troops crossed the river and entered the town. The battle in the Rhine-Ruhr area increased in intensity. Allied attempts to cross the Ruhr were frustrated, and attacks in the northern Black Forest and on the Rhineland were checked.

12. East Front: Reports on the fighting in the east were forwarded for

In Vienna, the German garrison is still holding out. The Car, Siliskin, and Danzig Bay areas remained quiet. In the Sudeten, the Soviets launched heavy attacks.
1. Other Frenu: In Italy, German prisoners were reported to have prevented further British penetrations west and northeast of Leghorn, and a landing of British forces east of Lake Como. Other Allied forces launched heavy attacks on the Ligurian coast and managed deep penetrations.

In the Pacific, Japanese Imperial Headquarters claimed two American battleships, three cruisers, one destroyer, and two other ships sunk at Okinawa. Ten other warships were reported damaged. The two airfields on Okinawa were claimed to be under such heavy Japanese artillery fire that the Americans could not make use of them. An American air attack on Tokyo Friday was said to have caused serious damage to the business districts, a famous Holy Shrine, and the Imperial Palace.

2. German Forces

a. Military: The evening broadcast to the Volkgericht reported that in the west, powerful American forces at Magdeburg were launching a strong counterattack on the Ruhr industrial area, the Allied forces were advancing in the direction of the Ruhr. In the east, the Allied forces were marching between the Oder and Danube Rivers. Heavy battles were in progress southeast of Vienna. No changes took place at the Oder or in Silesia.

b. Political: The passing of President Roosevelt still occupied the main news on foreign papers. Soviet Britain was said to have felt anxiety at his death, fearing that Anglo-American cooperation would collapse. President Truman was accused of being in ignorance of the course of the war since Mr. Roosevelt "left all alone to himself." Confiscations from the Soviet Union were claimed to be "massive." For Germany, the death of Mr. Roosevelt meant that even Germany's enemies couldn't alter the "last course of fate," one that a war couldn't be won by human calculations.

One Scheerke Kretz was quoted as writing that the Germans in the occupied areas regarded the occupation troops as the murderers of their families and the destroyers of their homes. As for the Soviets, continued the manuscript, they would eventually find their way back to German soil. Should this not be the case, the Allies would punish them anyway. The bomb terror had increased, but the Allies knew that a similar fate would meet their forces.

3. German Framework For Europe

a. Russian Mediation: Press dispatches from neutral capitals were reported to be emphasizing the political situation of the Soviet Union. The Yalta agreement was said not to bind Russia when she wanted a free hand.

Washington political circles were said to fear an open break among the Allies over the Polish problem. The Western Allies interpreted the Yalta understanding to mean that the Polish government should be reorganized, while the Russians insisted that the real solution would be in expanding Lublin. Patrick Hurley was said to have been sent to London and Moscow to try for an agreement before the San Francisco Conference.

b. West Front: American forces were said to have advanced towards the Elbe on a wide front, one to be heavily shelling Wittenberg and Magdeburg. Tank spearheads advanced beyond Gardelegen to the Elbe, as well as in another area further south.

An official military spokesman recognized the Ruhr pocket by saying that the American movements in the Ruhr area showed clearly the intention of clearing out German resistance still existing there. Actual fighting in the area was said to be for the roads of Dortmund, and for the area around Schwerin. Attempts to cross the Ruhr were frustrated.

In the northern sector, the fighting for the focal sector was said to have been especially fierce in the region of Lippstadt where the British gained little ground and paid dearly. The focal point of fighting between the Ems and the Weser was between Cloppenburg and the Ems Canal. The Canadians were able to enter Cloppenburg. In the battle north of Bremen, German troops attacked the Allied bridgehead.

American forces were attacking Leipzil from the west and southwest. Other assault units were reported in the region east of Kassel.
East Front: The quiet on the central Oder front was broken for the first time in the week by an artillery barrage and Soviet attacks in regimental strength from between the bridgeheads of Frankfurt and Fuerstenburg. These moves were said to look like testing efforts, and to prepare the way for the certain attack on Berlin which would come in cooperation with the American drive on the Elbe. The Russian bridgehead on the Oder at Fuerstenburg was attacked by German infantry and planes.

The most important fighting on the eastern front was still said to be in the areas of Vienna and Luxembourg. Street fighting continued in the Vienna area between the Danube Canal and the Danube. German reinforcements and reserves checked the Russians driving towards St. Loelson on a broad front. They also claimed to have destroyed the Soviet bridgehead over the River at Fuerstenfeld and trapped Soviet forces remaining there.

A large-scale Soviet attack in the Sandom was launched with 25 infantry divisions and more than 200 tanks after heavy artillery fire. The offensive was designed to end German resistance in that area, and to free Russian forces which had been tied down there.

1. German Domestic Propaganda

a. Respect for International Law: A warning to the German people to cease resistance as soon as the enemy had occupied a new area, under international law, to avoid the alternative of a sentence to death by court martial, was issued last night on a panel of the German radio's feature program, "Mirror of the Times."

In what appeared a complete reversal of previous appeals for fanatic resistance and the exhortation of praise for underground activities of the Werewolves behind the Allied lines, it was pointed out that only those persons who belong to some organized unit of the Waffen SS are entitled to fight the enemy. "They have to be recognizable by some insignia, even if it is only an arm band," it was stated, "or they must wear arms openly and definitely visible to the enemy."

This may even include a "ローン en masse" and it may include women, provided they may be recognized as members of an organized force. Any civilians fleeing to Germany could be treated as "Franz-Tirrers" by the enemy and could be shot. Even persons stealing enemy property would be liable to death by court martial.

With Allied tanks reportedly approaching suddenly in all parts of Germany, the broadcast stressed the importance of unflinching resistance by everyone who legally bears arms. But others, would be expected to uphold the German tradition of good discipline. "Since we Germans have been fighting this war in a most unholy war from the start, we shall continue to observe international law, even though our enemies no longer follow the rules."

Inasmuch as previous pronouncements have stressed that the Werewolves would consciously fight illegally and would not respect international law in their attacks against Allied troops and supply concentrations, this announcement seemed to controvert previous policy. On the other hand, it may be an attempt to vindicate German military honor and to discern current underground activities, since the German military authorities have denied that the Werewolves were sponsored by the government and insisted that the movement arose spontaneously from the people.

b. On the Führer’s Edict: Dr. Goebbels, in a radio address to the German people on the eve of Hitler's 56th birthday, painted a black picture of the present military situation and simultaneously extolled the virtues of Hitler, a leader who would undoubtedly become the man of the century, (see page 1).

Goebbels began by saying that now all the forces of destruction were asunder the Reich from its east, west and southwest borders for the last time, he was addressing himself to the nation on the occasion of the Führer's birthday as he had since 1933. In the past he had spoken during many of his radio addresses, "never before were things so much on the radio’s as they are today," never before had the German people faced such acute danger and been compelled to defend its existence in a "very last effort" to continue the life of the Reich. Today there was no time to speak to the Führer in his usual language or to tender him the traditional congratulations. "I do not believe I am being chauvinistic in regarding myself as the spokesman for the entire German people."

In 1939 the world of hate and jealousy passed against Hitler and the Reich. The coalition consisting Germany had not one aim to completely destroy Germany and throw the nation into the chaotic state experienced by the Reich after the Thirty Years War. Instead, superhuman efforts were required to ensure such a formidable world coalition. But it was not dishonor to fight this battle with pure hearts and a pure conscience. Germans were never to entertain thoughts of being unfaithful to Germany's historic mission, or vacillate "in the hour of greatest suffering." This was not only easy, it was German.

What Germany was experiencing today was the last act of a tragic drama which began on 1 August 1914 and which the Germans themselves interrupted in November 1918 at the very moment when the decision was to be made. It was this very reason that prompted the continuation of the drama on 1 September 1939. There Hitler's Birthday: In discussing the present threat to Germany Dr. Goebbels interposed his commentary with remarks of the highest praise and adoration of Hitler. He had particular reason to know the greatness of the Fuehrer since he had stood by him for the past 20 years. "I was near him when he reestablished the Reich through the terrible disasters of 1933 and eventually sailed into the wonderful prosperity which was interrupted by the beginning of the war in September 1939." Even today, he was standing by Hitler in a day when Fuehrer was putting his end his people through the severest tests. These times had found in the Fuehrer a "designed representative" and the only reason why Europe and the entire occidental world had not been thrown into a black abyss. "We will undoubtedly become the men of the century." That was the only man who remained faithful to himself and who did not sacrifice his ideals in an emergency. He constantly directed his efforts towards the one objective "which still today my spirit completely invisible" but which would one day again be apparent.

Times such as these demanded from a leader more than wisdom and activity. To surmount present obstacles - leader needed tenacity and courage. What have the enemy powers in which one can compare with these wonderful virtues of the Fuehrer? Nothing but their subjection superiority in material, their stupid goal of destruction that had become of their loudly publicized declarations? Where was the Atlantic Charter being carried out in prestige? Goebbels continued in this venomous vein describing "Allied atrocities" in Europe. He returned again to Hitler in sermons which made the Fuehrer a true representative of the Germans. "The German people has borne the Fuehrer, has made his rise until he can complete his successful execution of the war."

At this point Goebbels launched into a prediction of what the Germany of the Future would be. "After this war Germany will prosper as never before. All of Europe will share in this prosperity. Germany will become the friend of all nations of good will. The shoes will disappear and only the underground will remain over it (?) Should we be victorious then the work started in 1933 will be completed. But if Germany suffered defeat Europe would become an absolute shoe with revolutions and were following each other. Hitler was saving the fate of the Reich, however. German history was not abounding with able statesmen, but when they existed they gave not only to Germany but to the entire world as well. Today there was Hitler Germany's bravest heart."

Millions of people in all countries were looking up to this great man today. They are still doubting and asking whether he will find a way out of this great misfortune. He will show them. For we stand behind him, one people resolved to the very end. We need not look behind him. We shall not never, we shall not desert him. Fuehrer! Give your orders! We follow!"

The Austrian Fuehrer Youth Leader addressed his following on the same occasion. Large portions of the Reich were occupied; Allied superiority was tremendous; the air attacks were terrible. "Yet the Fuehrer is convinced of ultimate victory. This conviction came of superior knowledge. Hitler knew that a great nation could not be defeated, and that the German youth stood behind him ready to fight physically. On the eve of the Fuehrer's birthday, the Gestapo youth decides itself to fight to the end."

The Chancellor of Frankfort, Karl Hols, sent a telegram of congratulations to Hitler from Munich. He said that the fight for the city of the Reich's partly confounded his hopes. It would fight and fall in this town, "The most heroic of all towns," and the National Socialist idea would overcome all obstacles. Hitler's answer to Holz was brief and declared that Holz's attitude was an inspiration to millions of Germans. He ended by awarding Holz the Golden Cross of the German Order.

d. Allied Intention: While people in Britain and America are growing more and more impatient of a result of the unfulfilled promises of a quick end to the war, the military and underground resistance of the Germans is steadily increasing, according to a document by the British publication Time and Tide.

It was pointed out that the war crisis on more strains and difficulties becomes apparent in the United States and Great Britain, such as the problems of transport, communications and supply. Meanwhile, with the German front fighting viciously and the occupation hostile behind the lines, the Anglo-Americans are forced to abandon thoughts of an imminent German collapse and to realize that they face the "inconceivable heroism of the entire German people."

The determined resistance was evident in the spirit of the soldiers at the front. In the days, soldiers on the eastern front had destroyed 600 Soviet tanks, primarily because of the successful employment of the panzerfahrtruppe. At the same time, behind the Allied front, the German forces were increasing their activity and were causing severe Allied occupation forces. The successful operations of the Germans were reported in the Swiss paper Schweizer Illustrierte, which reported an Allied order that the "Germans will be fought with the utmost energy." It was stated that there is no protection against the German forces, for "its members are everywhere."

e. Occupation Graves: Ridiculing the shipment of Jews from Britain to "Russia for German youth, the domestic radio asserted that England is "the 1st country in the world that can hope to return to Russian country," for it will bring to trial 8,000 delinquent girls this year and 2,000 others are "already being boarded in special institutions."

In the German press Service reports carried the previous day of the brutal treatment by French soldiers and civilians of wounded German soldiers and Red Cross nurses in hospitals in France and the alleged Russian reconnaissance that 11 German property in Soviet-occupied parts of Germany now belongs to the Soviet Union, including human beings as well as cattle.

f. East Front: Fierce resistance by the parishes in former German cities was evidenced in operational reports with boasting the Allied advance to the east. Fighting was said to be continuing in the centers of Leipzig, Hanau, Posen and Hamburg, although it was acknowledged that Allied forces held considerable portions of each of the cities.

The communists and voice broadcasts admitted that the battle in the Ruhr pocket had been concluded. Troops under Field Marshal Model were praised for "exemplary fulfillment of duty" in having resisted the superior forces of an American army and having inflicted on them heavy losses in men and material.

In other sectors, the British were attacking strongly in the East Prussian border town of Soltau and were fighting for Lebus and Wolin. The Germans continued to resist Allied pressure in the Kursi Mountains, near the Kursk Front area, the Allies were pushing closer to Ansbach. Strong Allied attacks "on the inner ring of the German fortress" were repulsed.

g. East Front: The unusual violence of the Soviet mass assault before Berlin and to the south in the Lebusher Wiese area was again highlighted in reports from the east front, but it was maintained that the main impact of the assault had been checked, a breakthrough frustrated and all penetrations sealed off.

In the result of the battle, the Bolshevists were said to have penetrated to the core point of Lebuscher, on both sides of Solow, "to the eastern south of Wilsaen. West of the Donau, small wedges were reportedly pushed forward from north of Sokiltsa and northwest of Kremsmuid to the Spree on both sides of Silesia. Crossings of the Spree at several points were acknowledged."

On the southern wing of the front, the local points were on both sides of Nystadt, south of Brno and north of Moravia-Ostrava, and in each of these sectors the Germans claimed they frustrated Bolshevist attacks. A penetration into German lines east of Treznau near Moravia-Ostrava was admitted.
b. West Front: The Germans claimed that all British attacks between the Ems and the Ruhr had failed, and that they were pouring strength successfully south of the Ems Estuary. The right wing of the British Second Army, however, advanced between the Ems and the Elbe to enter the southern part of Lueneburg.

Superior American pressure forced the Germans to give up the ruins of Lueneburg, (not admitted in domestic). The German forces blew up the bridges over the Elbe before taking up their positions on the east bank of the river.

In the one south of Berlin there was street fighting in Potsdam, and the American attack on Liptov was stepped up. The assault from the northmost carried the Americans inside the city to the central railway station. In the east, of Dassow, the First Army pushed to within 15 miles of the Elbe.

The news assault on Kustrin was said to have been the dominating event in the entire southern sector. The press dispatches spoke of the rubble in the city which had been the "jewel of medieval architecture," and said that defects on the bridges of the city had forced the Americans to seal the city again. Other dispatches claimed that German counterattacks and ambushes had resulted in the capture of numerous American supply positions, supply convoys and such booty, including gasoline.

c. East Front: Fighting during the "fifth day of the battle for Berlin" grew more bitter yesterday, according to the official Berlin newspaper. Heavy Russian losses, which included more than 800 tanks destroyed between Kustrin and Frankfurt, were said to illustrate the intensity of the fighting against the Soviet offensive. It was observed as inevitable that several more concentrations would be made when the enemy used such forces.

The most important battle was fought for the area west of Kustrin where the Russians occupied some of the hills. In the frontal sector between Kustrin and Frankfurt the Soviet forces gained some ground. Soviet divisions south of Frankfurt advanced to the express highway, but were stopped there by German counterattacks. The German bridgehead on the east bank of the Oder near Frankfurt was given up after the bridges were destroyed.

The Russians also made two more but narrow concentrations in the Kalisz sector which forced the front back approximately to a line formed by the cities of Brzezien, Strasburg, and Guttten. Between Sarlitz and Guttten a great battle was raging after Soviet tanks broke through the main German defense line.

Eastern Front

Russian troops, fighting step by step through the heart of Berlin, have won positions on the Wilhelmstrasse and are approaching the capital's central boulevard, Unter den Linden. Furious hand-to-hand fighting developed around the Brandenburger Gate, the Pariser Platz, the Adlon Hotel and along the Leipzigerstrasse and Prinz Albrechtstrasse, where German troops, constructed a jungle fortress of barbed wire, mines, and chopp-dowm trees. In the outskirts of the city, the districts of Charlottenburg and Schöneberg were cleared.

While the final battles for Berlin continued to rage, Russian armies north, west, and southwest of the capital were racing forward to effect additional junctions with the British and Americans. North of the city the Russians are advancing toward the British along a 60-mile front and have captured Stralsund, Grimmen, Demmin, Ralsin, and Waren. West of Berlin the Russians took Brandenburg and are only 19 miles from American forces on the Elbe, while southwest of the city contact with the Americans on the Middle Elbe was expected imminently.

American Forces advanced to within 17 miles of Linz and to a point 10 miles from Innsbruck. Further north, other American troops raced across the new crossings of the Czechoslovakian frontier north of Passau, capturing several towns.

Allied Reports

Italian Front

One million German and Italian Fascist soldiers in Western Austria and Italy have surrendered unconditionally to the Allies. This was the largest group surrender of the war and marked the first time that German forces have given up unconditionally by agreement. Formal surrender proceedings took place last Sunday at Allied headquarters near Naples, when it was decided that the terms would become effective at noon Wednesday. Sixteen high Allied officers, including one Russian, and German SS and Luftwaffe officers participated. The agreement involves 27 German and six Italian Fascist frontline divisions, in addition to other rear echelon troops, and effects all German forces in Italy and in the Vorarlberg, Tyrol, Salzburg and parts of the Carinthian and Styrian sectors of Austria.

Eastern Front

Berlin has fallen. The end of German resistance in the capital was announced by Marshal Stalin in an Order of the Day in which he reported the surrender of the remaining garrison of 70,000 troops.

In an earlier Order of the Day, Stalin announced the complete destruction of the trapped German Wehrmacht Army which Hitler had ordered to break into the capital to relieve the doomed garrison. The order reported liquidation of the pocket southeast of Berlin and the surrender of 120,000 German troops there during the past week.

The fall of the large German port city of Rostock was announced by Stalin in a third Order of the Day. The port was taken by forces under Marshal Rokossovsky which dashed 40 miles from Stralsund, capture of which was disclosed earlier yesterday. The town of Warnemunde on the Baltic, seven miles north of Rostock, also was seized by Rokossovsky's troops.

Western Front

British Second Army forces have reached the Baltic at Warnemunde between Lubeck and Rostock and only 25 miles from the Russians in Rostock. The British 16th Airborne Division made a record advance of 40 miles in six hours to reach Warnemunde, while at the same time the 11th Army pushed forward 20 miles to reach Lubeck. As a result of these gains, the British have cut off Hamburg, Lubeck and Danzig from the rest of the shrinking German pocket in the north.

American forces pressing northward have reached the town of Schwerin, 26 miles south of Warnemunde. In the south, the Americans have cleared most of Bavaria and are only 25 miles from Salzburg and 16 miles from Innsbruck in Austria.

German Home Front

President Truman declared at a press conference that he was "convinced" that Adolf Hitler had been killed and said he was basing his statement on "authoritative information," the source of which he did not divulge.
Meanwhile, General Eisenhower confirmed that the Swedish official Count Bernadotte had seen SS Chief Himmler in Lubeck on 24 April. The Supreme Commander quoted a statement made at this conference by Himmler and SS General Schillenberg that Hitler was dying of a cerebral hemorrhage, which contradicts the claim of Admiral Doenitz that he had been killed in action in Berlin.

The Eisenhower statement tended to confirm the report of an offer of surrender made by Himmler and emphasized the fact that he is nothing but the claim by Doenitz to show he is now actually Fuehrer of the Reich. It was indicated that Himmler, as well as Doenitz, considers himself as head of the state.

Meanwhile, as British forces advanced to within 25 miles of Kiel from the west, a report over the German-controlled Danish radio stated that the city would not be defended. Other British forces reached a point 32 miles from Wilhelmshaven.

All German forces in northwest Germany, Denmark, Holland, Schleswig-Holstein, Heligoland and the Frisian Islands have surrendered unconditionally to Field Marshal Montgomery, commander of the British 21st Army Group. Marshall's statement that there would be a definite reduction in reenlistment requirements. The President has accepted the resignations of six other Cabinet officers, and Ickes is the last member of the Cabinet which Roosevelt appointed more than 12 years ago.

According to the reliable source, which UP said was close to the White House, there was no reason for the acceptance of Ickes' resignation other than the President's desire to have a Cabinet of his own choosing.

The War in the Pacific

Warships and planes of the Third Fleet yesterday further developed the new phase of naval warfare designed to crush the Japanese navy and industry. As carrier planes making their second attack in 36 hours sought out the Japanese navy, American heavy naval guns poured destruction on industrial areas.

Speaking of the incalculable assault, Admiral Halsey declared that a new phase of naval warfare was opening up, a final plunge into the heart of Japan. He only regretted that the ships did not have wheels to take them inland to mop up the enemy.

An estimated 800 carrier-based planes participated in the blows struck at shore installations in the Kure area for the second consecutive day. They also repeated their attacks on Kobe, the ship building center of Osaka Bay. In addition, more than 100 carrier planes hit the Japanese navy again yesterday, taking off in heavy weather they caught the enemy in what reports from some American warships described as an extremely vulnerable position.

Meanwhile, Radio Tokyo said without confirmation that American surface units were shelling the west coast of Honshu yesterday morning. The announcement from Admiral Nimitz's headquarters said only that the southernmost tip of Honshu was the target for the day's attacks.

Admiral Nimitz also announced that reconnaissance photographs show 19 of Japan's biggest cities, including Tokyo more than half destroyed. Seventy percent of the naval base at Kure was in ruins. Incomplete reports of the results of the carrier-based plane attacks in the past two days show that at least two enemy ships were sunk, three cruisers were damaged, and 64 planes were destroyed. These figures include the damage inflicted by British carrier planes. More than 575 Japanese planes were destroyed or heavily damaged in those Allied attacks.

From Manila General MacArthur announced further blows against the Japanese on the Asiatic mainland. More than 300 Far Eastern Airforce bombers and fighters continued the assault on Shanghai. One of the airfields in the area was heavily damaged and 45 planes destroyed or damaged. The Chinese high command announced yesterday that Chinese troops have broken into the south gate of Kweichow, a highway 35 miles south of Kweilin. Continuing their offensive, the Chinese are expected to take the former American air base within a few days.

Frontline dispatches indicated last night that the Japanese are continually pushing their troops down the Yangtze from Hankow towards Hankow and Shanghai. Their convoys travel at night to avoid Allied air attacks.

In Burma, the British have killed more than 5,000 Japanese in the past three days. The enemy is fighting hard to keep an escape route open for the forces trapped in the mountain. According to the dispatch, about one-half of the pocketed Japanese have been killed.

Potsdam Conference

The Potsdam Conference today will be carried on without the presence of two of the Big Three. Prime Minister Churchill arrived in England yesterday to await the announcement of the results of the British national election, and President Truman took advantage of the brief break in the discussions to be in Frankfurt today. He will lunch with General Eisenhower, present decorations to six British officers, and inspect the 8th Infantry Division and the Third Airborne Division.

During the absence of Truman and Churchill the conference will be carried on by other representatives. Yesterday a short meeting was held.
to pave the way for the continued conversations.

The arrival of Admiral Mountbatten in London from Potsdam was the indication that the supreme Commander of the Southeast Asia Theater was present at the conference. It is now known that he attended several sessions.

In the event of a Labor Party victory in the British elections, Clement Attlee would represent Great Britain at the conference. On Churchill's invitation he has been sitting in on the talks. It was expected that if the scheme take place there would be little set back for the discussions because the election campaigns showed that there was no sharp difference between them regarding foreign policy.

Pétain's Trial

The trial of Marshal Pétain in Paris went into its third day yesterday with Pétain still refusing to answer questions. During the day, former Premier Édouard Daladier publicly charged the Vichy regime with treason. He said that Pétain had destroyed the republic on 25 June 1940 and that this constituted the betrayal of France.

The former president of France, Albert Le Brun, spoke of the events leading up to the defeat of France. He called it a tragic moment when Pétain's Government got almost dictatorial power. Speaking of Pétain he said, "To have risen so high but to have fallen so low."

Belgium

The debate in the Belgian chamber of deputies continued yesterday with the presentation of evidence allegedly showing that King Leopold was unfit to rule Belgium again.

The Belgian Foreign Minister, J. Speks, presented letters written by the King's Secretary and evidence that Leopold had abandoned all hope of an Allied victory. Speks said that Leopold had done a number of things which condemned him in the eyes of the Belgian people. He had lived in Hitler's best apartment and had sent several telegrams to Hitler. In addition the King had educated his children in Germany.

The Occupation of Germany

The Allies are cooperating to solve the food problem in Berlin. The first trainloads of food from the British zone arrived last night. Other trainloads of flour are waiting to be unloaded in both the American and British districts. During the first days in July the Russians brought in 43,000 tons of food, or nearly all of the amount needed. It is expected that the British and Americans will resume services for the food advanced during the interval. To meet the transportation shortage the American authorities have rebuilt 2,000 German trucks to bring food from the American zone to the south.

Transportation in the Berlin area is reviving at a rate which surprises the experts. It is estimated that 1,300,000 passengers are being carried daily by train, subway, etc., out of 100 subway stations, 80 have been restored to operating condition.

Navy's Discharge

The Navy's previously announced point system for the discharge of older officers and men from the Navy went into effect yesterday. The plan provides for one credit for each year of age at least birthday plus another for each four months of active duty since 1 September 1939. The Naval Department said that men stationed in the US might be discharged within three months while those serving overseas would have to wait at least six months.

ANALYSIS OF WORLD BROADCAST TRENDS (4 to 10 June)

1. The French home radio continued its inconsistent treatment of the LEVANT crisis during the past week, on the one hand insisting on "rapprochement" with Britain and maintenance of the "indispensable friendship" between the two nations, and in numerous other broadcasts taking the contrary attitude that Britain was to blame for instigating the disorders.

2. In programs designed to modify the intense tone of resentment that marked French newscasts the previous week, it was stated that the LEVANT trouble can be solved and that success in working out the dispute would be a test of the value of the SAN FRANCISCO Conference. The PARIS radio, regretting that international politics and "age-old rivalries" had threatened the harmony of Allied unity, declared: "Let us not expect the worst from a painful territorial incident."

3. While the home radio gave prominence to these appeals for conciliation, news commentators did not soften their direct attacks against Britain. The most heavily weighted argument—that the British had encouraged unrest in the LEVANT to protect their own oil interests in Syria and Lebanon—was the theme of an editorial in RESISTANCE quoted over the home radio, which asserted that the "whole affair leaks of oil". It was also stated that the British knew the armes with which they provided the Syrians could be used against the French; that Syrian leaders purposely created disorders to give Britain a chance to intervene; and that CHURCHILL ordered the LEVANTINE troops to carry out a "coup de force" against French economic interests.

4. French programs presented candid coverage of press dispatches from the Middle East. BEIRUT papers were quoted as favoring the British action as a guarantee of independence for Syria and Lebanon, while an Egyptian paper was reported to have said the crisis could only be solved by the complete withdrawal of French forces from the LEVANT.

5. Russian home and foreign transmissions again emphasized the indissoluble Allied unity, citing the Four Power Declaration in BERLIN as another "proof" of close cooperation and criticizing elements that attempted to utilize the LEVANT crisis to discredit the SAN FRANCISCO Conference or to prove the disintegration of Allied Harmony.

6. The only point of argument at the BERLIN meeting was evident in varying versions of the declaration broadcast by the Russians and Anglo-Americans. While the Western powers stated in Article 6 that "nationals of any country at war with the Allies must be turned over by Germany," the Russians substituted the word "former" for "nationals" to indicate that they still considered Japan a friendly nation and will offer protection to Japanese nationals in their zone of occupation.

7. There was no let-up in the Russian campaign against reactionary and anti-Soviet elements in the United States. The CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE and the NEW YORK DAILY NEWS were charged with inciting America to war with the Soviet Union, and Mrs. LUCE was assailed as a mouthpiece of COMBELLS for her talk on the situation in nations liberated by the Red Army. The home radio also reported at length on the stinging attack launched by RED STAR against the ARMY AND NAVY JOURNAL for championing a campaign against the CRIMEA and BERLIN declarations. Tying the tide against American reactionaries to an earlier campaign against Argentina for concealing Nazi capital and agents, the Soviet radio attributed the parallel propaganda in the United States against the Soviet Union and for leniency with the Germans to business relationships between American industry and German capital in Argentina.

8. In support of the LUBLIN government in Poland, Russian transmissions criticized the LONDON COMMITTEE for keeping roles at DACHAU and in towns throughout Germany so that they could be organized under the "Fascist Fascist Government" instead of being permitted to return to their homes where they would fall under LUBLIN authority.

9. Russian radio propaganda to Germany again highlighted reconstruction work in the occupied zone, repeating in a friendly manner the "no work, no food" measure. Hope for "national regeneration" of Germany under the Allies was offered to the German people if they cooperated in the annihilation of all remnants of Nazism, aided in home reconstruction and, in general, collaborated with the occupying powers. The need for "reparation" for war guilt was also stressed, but the Russians failed to mention what form these reparations would take.

10. The Soviet line included a revival of the war criminal theme, an attempt to debunk prejudices against the Soviet economic system, a warning to Germans to develop their agriculture because they will not be fed by the Allies and a suggestion to landowners and industrialists that they might atone somewhat for their past guilt by aiding in reconstruction. A clever device was to bring to the microphone a German general who denied the 1918 "stab-in-the-back" legend.

11. STUTTGART Radio made its appearance in the growing network of Anglo-American MG stations, stressing in its first broadcast close cooperation with France. A Thomas MANN birthday show, originated by Radio LUXEMBOURG and curried by British and American occupation stations, developed the theme that despite Germany's display of its worst characteristics during the past decade, MANN had held steadfast to the "good German tradition."

12. Yugoslav broadcasts prior to the signing of the treaty ceding temporary control in TRIBSTE to Anglo-American occupation forces still pressed claims to TRIBSTE and the SLOVENE LITTORAL. The Italian home radio reported a series of party consultations in preparation for the formation of a new coalition government. LUBLIN attempted to whitewash the German people of responsibility for Nazi atrocities, while the Independent Spain wavelength noted the growing patriots army and urged Spanish youth to break up FRANCO's summer camps and to copy and publish clandestine newspapers.

13. A program over Radio VIENNA pointed out that the Soviet Union had not seized any of the nations it liberated and that it will not interfere with them if they retain democratic government. The Czech home radio said the nation would seek British and American as well as Soviet friendship. The Polish radio appealed to Poles abroad to return home and protested against the attempts of the emigre government to keep Polish nationals in Germany. Bulgaria reported that a Jewish organization had been formed in SOFIA to fight Fascism and anti-semitism and to defend Jews who suffered under Fascist regimes.
NOTES ON MARBURG

A. Political

1. Some political improvements during the past weeks are reported from MARBURG. The composition of the STAATPOLITISCHE AUSSENAUSSCHUSS, the Mayor's advisory board, has now been definitely crystallized to the satisfaction of most anti-Nazis in MARBURG. It consists of five members, two from the Democratic Party, one of whom is slated for the position of school supervisor for the LANDKREIS MARBURG, two from the Social Democratic Party, and one a Communist, new head of the City Garden Department. So far, they have functioned successfully in cooperation with the Mayor in preventing the re-employment of former Nazis returning to MARBURG, or in driving out those Nazis already in office.

2. Members of the board, who formerly complained bitterly of Mayor DEHML's arbitrariness and unwillingness to take advice, now admit, while still accusing him of favoritism, that they could not think of anybody who would at the moment make a better mayor. His appointment for the head of the labor office, DR. VON VICTOR, as a replacement for BLOCK, a former Nazi now under arrest by CIC, they approve of thoroughly. According to the chairman of the board, ADL, there is only one person in the administration to whom they still strenuously object, a Miss VON WISSLER, who acts as interpreter for MG.

B. Cultural

1. The setting of newspaper, library and musical personnel has proceeded far enough so us to ensure a considerable increase in local cultural activities under German segis in the very near future.

2. Up to now, musical activity in MARBURG has been confined to church concerts, and in one case, to a special concert of classical music. At present MG has six applications for musical producer's licenses on file which have not yet been completely processed. As soon as the proper questionnaires have been filled out, it is envisaged that all acceptable persons will be granted licenses enabling them to give concerts freely with the proviso that MG be notified as to the time and place of concert. All personnel used will have been investigated by CIC.

3. Steps have already been taken in securing a publisher and drawing up detailed plans for the "thought" magazine projected some time ago in MARBURG. This magazine, though published in MARBURG, is to have, insofar as possible, a national distribution. Its purpose: to provide a channel for suitable German intellectuals to discuss important problems with a view towards stimulating more active participation in the reeducation and cultural reconstruction of Germany. It would also give moral support to German intellectual elements, who have been persecuted and isolated by the Nazis, whose position has mentally remained unchanged since our occupation. About a dozen experienced writers are now being considered for positions on the editorial staff of this magazine.

4. MARBURG’s book stores have already been open for some three or four weeks. Unsuitable books have been removed and a fairly lively trade is underway. A Herr ROPEL, who opened his lending library on 14 June, reports that on the first morning half of his customers requested books in English. These requests were also made in other bookstores, particularly for English-German dictionaries. Herr ROPEL has already opened his special English section with American Special Services Editions, which he has picked up from those of MARBURG’s citizens who billeted Americans in their homes. Aware that these are U.S. Government property, he says that he is lending these books free of charge; he hopes that other U.S. and British books and periodicals may soon be available. At present, he says, the "Stars and Stripes" is enjoying great popularity among the Germans, without indicating where the Germans obtained the paper.

REHABILITATION OF KZ INMATES IN FRANKFURT

1. Picking up FRANKFURT, released inmates of concentration camps have made of the city a MECCA in which they, the most persecuted of all by the Nazis, hope to find refuge.
This migration to the largest city in the American zone is stimulated by the fact that it also houses the highest American occupational authority, under which, it is rumored, peacetime conditions are being restored more rapidly than anywhere else. Many Jewish people, particularly, regard FRANKFURT as the gateway to their destination - PALESTINE, while others recall that FRANKFURT was once an international city and the regular gateway to the east. At present, however, FRANKFURT officials must envisage only the immediate needs of the refugees, in which direction some steps have already been taken.

2. The major task of rehabilitating former KZ inmates is in the hands of the FUERSORGEAMT (Welfare Office) which is under the jurisdiction of the Mayor’s office. The FUERSOR-GEAMT is broken up primarily into special offices which devote their facilities exclusively to this problem. They are headed by a Central Office which acts as a clearing and organizational center whose personnel is comprised of former BUCHENWALD prisoners. From this central office the Special Offices theoretically branch off into the Labor, Housing, Food, and Chamber of Commerce Offices of the city administration, to meet these respective needs of refugees. Coordination of all these offices is entrusted to a representative appointed by the Mayor. It is his duty to keep the Mayor informed of all progress, and to facilitate the problems of the Offices as far as contact with various officials is concerned.

3. At present, only the Housing and Labor Offices contain Special Offices, but others are scheduled to open shortly, staffed entirely by former concentration camp inmates. These individuals, although admittedly in great need of recuperation, realize the full implications of the job and have volunteered to begin work immediately.

4. The Welfare Office has at its disposal over 190 beds, distributed, for the most part, throughout eight hotels in FRANKFURT. These beds are reserved only for citizens of FRANKFURT; transients are housed in two separate houses containing about 200 beds. The Mayor's Office also by the Welfare Office with RM 300 per returning inmate. The same office also provides each Special Office with tickets for food, clothing, and furniture, and access to housing facilities.

5. Each individual must go through a set procedure upon first reporting to city officials. He must report to the cleaning office where his case is thoroughly investigated by a former inmate like himself. His papers and references are checked and his personal history evaluated to establish whether or not he is a KZ inmate, former PW, DP, professional criminal, citizen of FRANKFURT, transient, or a man who goes from city to city taking advantage of similar organizations. If he is a former PW he is sent to a corresponding office; if a DP, the case procedure; if a criminal or a racketeer, he is turned over to the police. If he is found to be genuine, he receives RM 300, clothing and food tickets. Transients are encouraged to proceed to their native towns. FRANKFURTERS are housed and sent to the Labor Office where they are given aid in finding employment.

MAST-GRAFT

1. This report is taken from an account by Dr. Eduard FRESENIIUS of FRANKFURT on THE HISTORY of his early experiences with Nazism, especially of the way in which he, with perfectly straight face and virtual immunity, managed to intrude upon himselfs officially into a walk of life as non-political as chemistry, and to proceed infallibly to use their official influence for their personal gain.

2. At the time of HITLER's assumption of the Chancellorship, FRESENIIUS was in Switzerland. Then he returned to Germany, he found that employees in his pharmaceutical business, which included a large chemical shop, greeted him with marked reserve. He felt that something was in the wind, and called a meeting of the chemists' union, of which he was chairman. When the meeting convened, he noticed that there were quite a few strange people among the crowd who were all dressed in some kind of uniform. When he was about to take the chair of the meeting, he was pushed aside by one of these uniformed men, who declared that the KREISLEHRUNG in KASSEL had appointed him to the chairmanship. When FRESENIIUS tried to reason with him, the other replied: "If you make any difficulties, I shall have you arrested by the SA." At the same moment a building door opened, through which entered half a dozen men in SA uniform, who stationed themselves around the room. It later turned out that both the author of the KASSEL order, ZIS, and the men who took the chairmanship, TOEBERL, were ex-cons. It also turned out that neither his uniform nor that of the SA men was authorized. Both men were later ejected from the Party, though TOEBERL was given a chemist business in Berlin.

3. At the meeting in question, evidence against FRESENIIUS of the most trivial nature was given by only one witness, a Nazi in uniform. The cardinal character of the meeting, says FRESENIIUS, became more obvious when it was closed after only a few minutes. Friends afterwards told FRESENIUS that a new "official chemist" (VERTRAUENSAPHOTEXER) had been appointed whose job it was to inspect doctor's prescriptions, to control prices of drugs, etc. This man, however, whose position was one of some responsibility, had had several penalitentry convictions. He was also a member of the SS, and wore the uniform at every opportunity.

4. The Nazi chemists then set out to ruin FRESENIUS personally. Although his HIRSCH-APOTHEKE was the largest drug store in FRANKFURT, and a good deal of his business was in supplying hospitals, this business was completely stopped by the Nazis and taken over largely by TUECHEK's own drug store. Soon after this THEOBALD, the new "official chemist," referred to FRESENIUS publicly as a "servant of the Jews" (JUDENRECHT), whereupon FRESENIUS sued him for slander. The proceedings aroused considerable interest in FRANKFURT and came to be known as the "JUDENPROZESS." At the trial, during the preliminary character investigation, THEOBALD was not asked whether he had any previous convictions, whereas FRESENIUS, who had not had any, was. The defendant's attorney then established all sorts of more or less remote associations of FRESENIUS with Jews, including his close friendship with Dr HIRXHEIMER, director of the dermatology clinic and dean of medicine at the University of FRANKFURT. The court decided that FRESENIUS was in fact a "JUDENRECHT" and that therefore THEOBALD's statement did not constitute slander. On the advice of his lawyer, however, FRESENIUS hired a Nazi attorney who in short order had the verdict reversed, and FRESENIUS was refunded the costs of the original trial. The Party continued, however, to exert every kind of financial and moral pressure on FRESENIUS, particularly by infiltrating Nazis who did not necessarily have the slightest knowledge of chemistry, into his concern.

5. Two examples of this latter kind of chicanery are particularly instructive concerning Nazi methods. One was that of HEIMES, who was appointed manager of the HIRSCH-APOTHEKE. This man kept busy by hanging pictures of HITLER in every conceivable place throughout FRESENIUS' chain, even in secret rooms. When FRESENIUS asked him to remove this ridiculous number of pictures, HEIMES reported him to the Party. The other case was that of one RINKE, who had formerly done the printing for FRESENIUS' trade paper. When FRESENIUS came back from Switzerland in 1933, he found posters and orders everywhere bearing RINKE's signature. On enquiry, FRESENIUS found out that RINKE had been appointed foreman of his concern, and that he, FRESENIUS, had to bow to his orders. RINKE arbitrarily dismissed employees, but could not be dismissed himself because he was a Party member. In 1934, RINKE fraudulently reported a number of alleged misdemeanors on the part of FRESENIUS to the Party. The Party wrote FRESENIUS, telling him that if RINKE's accusations were true, his concern would be closed. FRESENIUS insisted on a hearing together with RINKE. The this was not granted after several months of waiting, FRESENIUS went to the Party office and exposed the fraud. Thereupon RINKE was dismissed from FRESENIUS' concern. A year later, however, RINKE paid FRESENIUS a visit, dressed in SS uniform, and said that he was living very well as President of the Union of Large Families (VERBANDES DER KINDELRICHTEN) and as cultural deputy for FRANKFURT/WEST.

ANNEMARIE SCHOLL AND THE SCHOLL-HUBER MUNICH ANTI-NAZI GROUP OF 1943

1. ANNEMARIE SCHOLL was born on 6 August 1922 in KARLSRUHE, BADEN. She attended the VOLKSCHOLE in KARLSRUHE and the Gymnasium of Freiburg and Heidelberg and subsequently followed her father’s wish by registering at Heidelberg University to take up studies in medicine, although her own desire had been to become a kindergarten teacher. When she had finished the Summer to Winter 1942 semester at Heidelberg University, she transferred from Heidelberg to Munich for the Winter-Spring semester of which she was able to complete six weeks before being arrested by the Gestapo. She had by that time reached the age of twenty.

2. Politically, Annemarie Scholl had been conditioned against the Nazis by her parents. Her father, a former Gauleiter of the Landesversichulungsanstalt Balken in Karlsruhe, was an outspoken anti-Nazi. When Annemarie came home one day in 1938 to tell him that she had joined the BDM, he told her to go right back and cancel her membership, although membership had already become obligatory. Thus, Annemarie was a member of the BDM for less than an hour although, at the age of sixteen, she did not understand her father’s decision and envied the other girls for the pleasure of the week-end trips arranged by the BDM. She became politically conscious at the age of twenty, under the influence of her cousins Hans and Sophie Scholl, through whom she was introduced to the political meetings at Professor Hübner’s house in Munich.

3. It has been rather difficult to determine the exact nature of the political convictions of Prof. Hübner’s group through Annemarie Scholl. This is undoubtedly due to the fact that she had not reached political maturity at the time owing to her youth. Although most of the members of the Hübner group were strongly religious and most of them were Protestants, they had nothing to do with any organized church agreement, such as the Bekennendenkirchen. Hans Scholl, Annemarie’s cousin, was the leading member of the group next to Prof. Hübner. Opposition to the war, which was regarded as lunacy and a senseless and criminal sacrifice of German Youth, was the most outspoken political trend of the group according to Annemarie Scholl. The members of this group met at Prof. Hübner’s house almost every night.

4. The incident which unleashed the actions causing the death of six members of this group was a speech by Gauleiter and Reichsstudentenführer Giselehr, held on 30 January 1943 in the Congress Hall of the Deutsches Museum in Munich, after the Stalingrad disaster and on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of Hitler’s assumption of power. All students had to attend the meeting. Gauleiter Giselehr began his address in general terms, but suddenly turned to harangue his audience. He told the students that it was entirely out of place to study at that time, and that all male students ought to go to the Eastern Front where they belonged. The women ought to replace the men whenever necessary. They ought to increase the birthrate and they should cease behaving like whores (DIEHEN) as they were doing now.

5. At this point, a storm broke loose in the audience and GIESLER was prevented from continuing his speech by the uproar of the students. After some time, the students attempted to leave the building. They found the exits blocked by SS men who arrested all they could get hold of, among them Sophie SCHOLL, and hauled them into the Gestapo jail. After a few interrogations had taken place during the night, the arrested students were released next morning.

6. This speech of Gauleiter GIESLER precipitated the execution of plans which had been discussed for some time among the students composing the HUBER group. During the two weeks following the speech, the gatherings in Prof HUBER's house took on the character of organized political meetings more than ever before. Members of the group were busy procuring paper, in drafting and printing leaflets, and in renewing contact with students at other universities, principally those of JENA and VIENNA. Hans SCHOLL estimated that there were four thousand more or less active sympathizers with the group at the Universities of MUNICH, JENA and VIENNA. Many of the students supporting the group at the JENA and VIENNA Universities had originally been influenced by Hans SCHOLL when they were studying in MUNICH, and had then spread his doctrines on leaving MUNICH University. Annemarie SCHOLL thinks the majority of students at MUNICH University sympathized with Prof HUBER's group, although fear deterred most of them from taking an active part. Annemarie states that Hans SCHOLL and his immediate associates were always clearly aware of the risks they were running and made no secret of them to other potential comrades.

7. On the morning of 16 February 1943, early risers in MUNICH were struck by the sight of wall inscriptions on all major squares of the city. They consisted of the alarming sentence: "DOWN WITH HITLER! LONG LIVE FREEDOM!" The inscriptions were written in red paint and composed of block letters forty centimeters high. They were removed by the MUNICH fire service as soon as they had been spotted, and very few people actually saw them.

8. Hans SCHOLL was the author of these inscriptions and the stencils had been cut by Alex SCHMIRKEL. Prof HUBER, Prof MUT, Herbert G. AP, Sophie and Annemarie SCHOLL had been initiated into the action and they waited for the return of Hans SCHOLL, who had left them shortly before midnight, during the night from the 15th to the 16th of February 1943. He returned undiscovered at about four o'clock in the morning.

9. While the police and the Gestapo worked feverishly in an effort to find the culprits, Hans SCHOLL spent his nocturnal printing leaflets in a rented cellar in the THURNKONSTASSE, where he had installed a printing press. The paper was procured by Prof HUBER and Prof MUT, as well as by Annemarie and Sophie SCHOLL, who stole part of it from the University supply room. The text of the leaflets was composed by Hans SCHOLL and Prof HUBER.

10. Annemarie SCHOLL has given an approximate reproduction of the leaflet text. The text began by saying these words: When Front where they belonged. The women ought to replace the men whenever necessary. They ought to increase the birthrate and they should cease behaving like whores (DIRNEN) as they were doing now.

5. At this point, a storm broke loose in the audience and GIESLER was prevented from continuing his speech by the uproar of the students. After some time, the students attempted to leave the building. They found the exits blocked by SS men who arrested all they could get hold of, among them Annemarie SCHOLL, and hauled them into the Gestapo jail. He returned undiscovered at about four o'clock in the morning.

10. Annemarie SCHOLL has given an approximate reproduction of the leaflet text. The text began by asking the question: 'What is all this young German blood being spilled for, when...'
the war has become hopeless as a result of the MALAGAS disaster? It is easy for those who have never suffered to say that the war will be fought to the last man. The wounded are crowding our hospitals and yet it is officially stated that our losses are small. German soldiers are said to be fighting for the safety of their loved ones at home, yet these same women and children are daily killed in air raids caused by the war. The Netherlands can only be saved if the PUNEN are done away with. All those who are tired of this miserable existence must help in the overthrow of the criminals who govern Germany. All Germans must be fully conscious of the fact that victory cannot be gained any longer. All must help to achieve real freedom, which can only be achieved if God is with us.

11. A total of 50,000 copies were printed. 20,000 of them were sent in packages of thousands to sympathizers at the Universities of JENA and VIENNA by Sophie SCHOLL, while Hans and Suzi HILZEL, 18 and 21 years of age, disposed of a similar amount by throwing small bundles of them into corridors and house-door mail boxes, while Alex SCHOLL abled them into books at the University Library. 2,000 were distributed in the main hall of the University by the three SCHOLLS. This incident took place on 19 February 1943 and led to the discovery of the entire conspiracy.

12. At 8:30 in the morning of 19 February 1943, Hans, Sophie and Annemarie SCHOLL met in the lobby of the University. They exchanged a few words and separated. Hans went up to the gallery of the main hall, opened his briefcase which was filled with leaflets and threw its entire contents down into the lecture room. Sophie and Annemarie, who had mingled with the audience, picked up the leaflets and handed them on to the students. This incident was observed by Janitor SCHOLL, and Hans and Sophie SCHOLL were arrested two days later, on 22 February 1943, at 8:30 in the morning, upon his denunciation.

13. Three hours later, they were tried for high treason b. the REICH VOLKSGERICHTSHOF which had been flown to MUNCHEN during the preceding night for that purpose. Alex SCHOLL, who has been arrested an hour after Hans and Sophie SCHOLL, was tried together with them. They were defended by Dr BAIN- DOF, OF MUNCHEN, for whom Annemarie SCHOLL has nothing but praise. The public was not admitted to this trial which took place at the KAFFENSTAAT MUNCHEN-STAATSHOF and ended with a sentence of death by decapitation for the three accused:

Sophie SCHOLL, 22, sister of Hans SCHOLL, medical student, and Alex SCHOLL, 23, painter, who had finished his studies at the MUNCHEN Academy.

14. Annemarie SCHOLL states that when hans and Sophie SCHOLL were asked by the court if they really felt capable of killing HITLER, they replied, with one voice: "Yes, even this very minute." When executed, Sophie SCHOLL had a broken leg, as the result of the treatment she received during interrogation by the Gestapo. Her last words were: "Lord God, thou art my refuge, for ever and ever." None of the accused betrayed the names of any of their associates. The sentences were carried out at 4:30 pm on 22 February 1943 in KAFFENSTAAT MUNCHEN-STAATSHOF.
15. Between 27 February 1943 and March 16th, the time between the death of the above three and Annemarie's arrest, the news of the trial spread like wildfire through Münch. People began to avoid Annemarie SCHOLL because of her surname. Others spat out in front of her to show their disgust on the street and in hotels. Prof. KERSH and Annemarie SCHOLL often passed D.S.C.IAO headquarters after Annemarie's death, and Prof. KERSH often suggested that they should go inside and give themselves up. Finally, he did not do so because he knew that they would be discovered in a few days in any case.

16. Annemarie SCHOLL was arrested on 16 March 1943, together with a total of approximately 169 people of whom she knew only those who were tried together with her or before her. On 16 March, she was taken to G.S.C.IAO headquarters in Münch where she remained until about 16 April 1943. During these six weeks, she spent an average of eight to ten hours in the interrogation room every day. Only one hour a day, however, was as a rule devoted to interrogation proper. The rest of the time she sat on a chair while the interrogators played cards, ate or drank. The interrogation was confined to two basic questions: who were accomplices and were there accomplices? Interrogation was always accompanied by physical violence. KÜNIG, MOCK and SCHMIDT were the interrogation officers and, during the entire period, they worked together and had no other function but to interrogate Annemarie SCHOLL.

17. On the day of her arrest, Annemarie SCHOLL weighed 126 pounds. After six weeks of G.S.C.IAO hospitality, her weight was reduced to 85 pounds. She received no food whatsoever on the first three days, later bread, soup and water, with nothing at all for a day or so in between. Four interrogations took place in the first day, three of one hour each and one of four hours. During the first hour, she received about fifteen strokes with a rubber police truncheon across the back, the neck and the chest. As interrogation went on, the number of strokes increased to twenty per hour. On the second day, the rubber truncheon was replaced by a leather whip. Twice she had to undress and was beaten naked. Medical investigation at P.R.I.S.I.N.G., 23 June 1945, revealed a lesion in the right lung tip as the result of this treatment.

18. On 14 March, she was taken into a cellar room (size approximately four by six meters) which was completely dark and accessible only through a trap door in the basement of the G.S.C.IAO building. When she was reached the floor of this room, the ladder on which she had descended was withdrawn and the trap door closed. The room was then gradually flooded with artificially cooled water which ran out of holes in the walls. When the water had reached the level of her hips after about half an hour, the flow stopped. She was kept in this condition from 7 p.m. to 3 a.m. Then she was then taken out into the street for a half hour, while her clothes froze to the body. Finally, she was interrogated for ten minutes. She believes this was an attempt to make her talk by making her sick.

19. The experience which brought Annemarie SCHOLL nearest to confession was when, towards the end of March 1945, all fingers of both her hands were put into thumbcuffs. She was exposed to this torture for eight consecutive hours, during which the pressure was increased at regular intervals. Another attempt to make her talk by putting her into a high-flooded room with mirrors had little effect. Initially frightened, she quickly accustomed herself to the situation, kept her eyes shut and covered with her hands and did not answer a single question.

20. Annemarie states that she did not betray a single name in spite of these interrogation methods, while she volunteered whatever information was wanted about her personal activities. She states that she used to sit for hours without uttering a single word and that the example of Hans and Sophie SCHOLL, who had died for their beliefs, as well as her own deep religious convictions, helped her to overcome such crises. Her power of resistance grew when she observed that the interrogators became nervous and disgruntled over their failure to extract information from her as time went by.

21. While under investigation at the Gestapo, Annemarie SCHOLL was raped twice. On 27 March 1943, towards 2:30 in the morning, KUNIG, MOOR and SCHREMM entered her cell together, tied her feet and hands to the posts of her bunk and raped her, one after the other. She was not ten on that occasion, but remained tied to the bed till next morning at 7:30 when she was freed by Warden KISCH. It had been her first sexual experience. She went through the same ordeal a second time towards the middle of April, tied to her bunk in the same position, but this time also held down by an iron chain which was fastened to the bunk and her body at stomach level. She remained chained to the bunk from 10 pm to 7:30 am next morning.

22. On about 20 April 1943, Annemarie SCHOLL left Gestapo headquarters. She had to sign a slip stating that she would not reveal anything of what had happened to her there. When she arrived at her prison the accompanying Gestapo official told the woman doctor of the prison that she had been the victim of a mutiny. Annemarie told the doctor the truth, however. During her confinement prior to the trial, she was given much comfort by the regular visits of the AMSTPARRER, Dr. OTTO ALT, who had talked to both Hans and Sophie SCHOLL before their execution. He visited Annemarie constantly until he suddenly ceased to come altogether. Annemarie assumed that Dr ALT was put out of the way by the Gestapo, for he had arranged for the funeral of Hans and Sophie SCHOLL, which was attended by a large number of students and at which Dr ALT held the funeral oration.

23. Annemarie SCHOLL's trial took place on 4 May 1943. She was defended by the same Dr AMSTPARRER who had defended Hans and Sophie SCHOLL and the trying advocacy was the same BERNHARD GUTSCHATSMANN who had condemned them. She was accused of high treason and of being an accessory to high treason. Annemarie states that when the public prosecutor demanded the death penalty, she was very happy because she wished for nothing better than to be able to follow Hans and Sophie SCHOLL. She states she was disappointed when the sentence of six years penitentiary with subsequent detention in a concentration camp was pronounced. Hans KLASK, another member of the NSDAP group tried on the same day, when told of his sentence of eight years penitentiary, told the court in broad BAVARIAN dialect: "Oh, but I had expected much more than just eight years of penitentiary." At a review of the trial on 27 May 1943, Annemarie SCHOLL's sentence was commuted to three and a half years of penitentiary by the LANDERSSCHRIFTSFOP AUSCHWITZ. Of those, she served two years when she was liberated on 5 May 1945.
ANALYSIS OF EUROPEAN BROADCAST TRENDS
(27 JUNE TO 4 JULY)

1. Indications of Russian plans for the political and economic re-orientation of Germany in the Eastern zone were discernible during the past week in the Soviet-sponsored programs carried over Radio BERLIN and the Free Germany wavelength.

2. Using as a basis the reported meeting in BERLIN the previous week between Communists and Social Democrats, at which first plans were drawn up for building an anti-Fascist republic, Free Germany advocated a fusion of the two parties for "collaboration in the democratization of all Germany." In an attempt to spur working class unity and cooperation of the trade unions with the political parties, the same station pointed out that the German workers, through their disunity, had given HITLER the opportunity to rise to power. Now they could stoke for their guilt by joining with the dominant parties in reconstructing a parliamentary German Government.

3. The tentative platform of the Social Democratic Party, as presented over Radio BERLIN, was as follows: nationalization of banks, insurance, mines and power; the abolition of income from landed property; the resettlement of city dwellers on large landed estates; the extension of social insurance; and the redrafting of the industrial law.

4. In one of the first references to educational plans on the Eastern Germany radio, BERLIN stated that thousands of teachers have been selected for their moral qualities as well as political suitability and that they were prepared to impart a "democratic education" to their pupils. At a convention of the "Cultural League for Democratic Regeneration," Lord Mayor WERNER stressed that the true birthright of Germans was in the realm of culture and religious and moral education, rather than in the striving for imperialist expansion.

5. While holding out the possibilities for Germany's future development, the Russians continued to stress the war guilt of all the German people, the necessity for eradicating every trace of Nazism and the obligation of Germans to assist in reconstruction and to make reparations for their crimes. After emphasizing that the punishment for minor Nazis would be "hard physical work," BERLIN reminded non-Party members posing as guiltless and therefore not participating in reconstruction that as Germans they also will be held accountable for the sins of their nation.

6. In the Western zone, Radio LUXEMBOURG carried the ceremony of the handing over of the AACHENER NAZICHATTEN to German publishers; reported the opening of theatres and cinemas in the British sector; and quoted an NS official as declaring that the Bavarian civil administration might be handed over to the Germans by 1 November. LUX Radio, commenting that the "spectre of famine" hangs over the German people, urged them to cultivate "every meter of land."

7. The SAN FRANCISCO Charter received an enthusiastic reception from the Russian home radio and press. It was pointed out that all Soviet newspapers had published the complete Charter text and were unanimous in the opinion that the accord among the great powers was a guarantee of lasting peace. Commentator ERMAZEV, admitting that the Charter had some "shortcomings," declared that it was the best document that could be drawn up and that its strength would lie in the whole-hearted backing of the United States and the USSR, neither of which had been included in the League of Nations.

8. Praising the Trans-Carpathian agreement between Russia and Czechoslovakia, the Soviet services asserted that the people of Ruthenia had "dreamed for generations" of reuniting with the Russian Ukraine and had received news of the treaty with "rejoicing."

9. The French radio was characteristically cautious with respect to the SAN FRANCISCO Charter, pointing out that participation of the United States and the Soviet Union gave some assurance of the strength of the Charter, but at the same time warning that an exaggerated value should not be placed on its capacity to maintain the peace.

10. As the discussion on the TANGIER Zone got underway, PARIS and the AFP press service agreed that in her role as protector of the Moroccan empire it was France's duty to guarantee the sovereignty of the Sultan of Morocco. Commentator BENAZET declared on the home radio that the omission of Russia from the talks was "yet another political error" committed by the United States, Britain and France.

11. While Turkish reaction to Russia's demand for a "privileged position" in the Dardanelles was described as violent by French correspondents, the French home service asserted that Russian demands are "normal," that they offset the British action in Syria and that Russia is not seeking a base, but merely "security guarantees."

12. Meanwhile, as broadcasters from all over Europe played up Soviet-Turkish friction, Radio ANKARA made a concentrated effort to submerge the problem by stating that it was of "minor importance." ANKARA claimed that the Russians were demanding that the Dardanelles be closed to all warships except those of Turkey and Russia and that the DARS district border be changed, but stated that the Soviets respected the other provisions of the MONTREUX agreement. It was noted that since the problem was of international scope, it would undoubtedly be settled at the forthcoming Big Three meeting.

13. Czech claims to the TESCHEN territory were voiced over PRAGUE Radio in reply to Polish claims that TESCHEN is Polish "historically and nationally," and that on the principle of self-determination, the area should be assigned to Poland. Czech Premier FIERLINGER declared that TESCHEN is "historically" Czech, but he expressed Czechoslovakia's willingness to reach a "friendly agreement" that would involve the exchange of populations. Several days later, PRAGUE Radio reported that the government had approved the report of the delegation to the MOSCOW talks, one point of which was that the TESCHEN frontier was fixed in 1920 and would not be altered again now. "Some territory was yielded to the Soviet Union because of necessity and propriety under the Trans-Carpathian agreement," said a commentator, "but it would be difficult to explain another territorial concession to Poland."

14. Paying little attention to the TESCHEN question, Polish stations continued to stress the joy of the people over the new democratic Government of National Unity. As Vice Premier MIKOLAJCZYK was quoted as stating he will be followed home by many other exile Poles, "who long and desire to be with you," LUBLIN carried assurances to Poles abroad that their personal safety was guaranteed if they did not carry out any terroristic activities.

15. Radio BELGRADE frequently reiterated the charge that British and American military authorities have reintroduced Fascist rule in TRIESTE and the Slovene Littoral by recalling to office former Fascist officials and eliminating the peoples' representative organs. Broadcasts from Italy acclaimed TRUMAN'S denunciation of tyranny and reaction at SAN FRANCISCO and said it intensified Italy's determination to rid itself of every remnant of Fascism.

16. In a broadcast from the Netherlands, Premier SCHERMERHORN said that reconstruction at home was of great importance, but promised that Holland's first concern would be in aiding in the war against Japan. Radio MADRID continued its anti-Soviet line, warning the Western world to act against Russia now because the "wait and see policy favors MOSCOW's designs." Belgium offered no significant developments on the constitutional crisis, but hinted that the presence with the King of leading ministers and jurists indicated that LEOPOLD'S abdication act was being drawn up.
BRANDENBURG 12TH ARMY GROUP WORLD BROADCAST SERVICE
Covers broadcasts from 1200 16 July to 1200 17 July (Prepared by F. & F. Detachment)

1. Germany: Berlin, one of the Soviet-controlled stations, broadcast the resolution adopted by the four anti-Fascist blocs demanding the German peoples' right to decide and calling for a "new chapter" in German history based on an anti-Fascist democratic order. Free Germany told the local and foreign Nazi-Nazi Party members that they would not be excluded from participation in the democratic rebirth of German and have nothing to fear if they honestly expunge the Nazi poison from their minds and work hard at reconstruction and repatriation.

Berlin's "humanity" in differentiating between the real war criminals and the rest of the German people was emphasized. Berlin radio now proclaimed to efforts for the revival of trade. The cruelty campaign was again on the evening. Moscow and Berlin continued to defend the Nazi race theory and Hitler's claim that he solved unemployment in Nazi Germany. The Potsdam Conference was only mentioned in passing.

Luxembourg radio announced the founding of a "Society of Political Prisoners of the Nazi System" in Stuttgart.

2. Russia: Post-programmes highlighted the competition of workers in the USSR, reconstruction at home and in adjacent countries and the German regime in Greece. Soviet propaganda attacked American reactionary papers, noted democratic progress in Poland, Hungary and France and intensified the anti-Greek campaigns.

The home radio said: a. To celebrate the victory, workers of several industries staged a socialist competition, which is the "most striking expression of Soviet heroism and patriotism. The whole Soviet people will follow the competition with untiring attention." b. The Soviet Government undertook to pay half of the expenses of Greece's restoration. Every Polish hand and brain is needed to complete the job. Polish eruptions must return home as quickly as possible. c. Tens of thousands of Greek anti-Fascists are being tortured in Greek prisons. d. A Bulgarian democratic union in Pennsylvania, comprising about 0.5 million workers, enjoys "free democratic freedom," fully supports the Greek Government, popularizes Soviet friendship and strives to consolidate brotherly relations with Americans and to eradicate the remnants of Fascism. e. The Tripartite Liberation Council demands Lorentz's release. f. The Daily Herald said Eulenberg submitted a plan for Germany's reconstruction to the British military administration.

Foreign broadcasts said: a. In Italian: The forecasts of US reactionaries that an anti-allied government of Germany would not entertain the "regime proved false." The "strange story" of German soldiers in Schleswig-Holstein must be allayed. b. In English: Relations to the Bulgarian Peasants' Assembly will be the "first really democratic elections in Bulgaria." The program of the Bulgarian Rutherford Front is a "substantial manifestation of democracy." Those who started the anti-Soviet campaign in the Belgrade press are Fascist slanderers and must be shamed out. In Greece, under the guise of a fight for democracy, every manifestation of democracy is suppressed and the whole country has been turned into a "hot-bed of Fascism and a hot spot of war." c. In Persian: Reactionary criminals in Turkey and Iran "shrink from nothing" to step up distrust between the two countries and the Soviet Union. However, the Iranian nation will be able to suppress all anti-Soviet provocations. d. In Hungarian: Hungary is becoming a "genuinely democratic state." The Nazis have completely devastated Hungary's economic life.

3. France: Commentators continued to protest France's absence from the Potsdam Conference. Le Figaro, addressing himself from radio France (Algiers) to the "dear public of the six flags," declared that France's prestige in German eyes was part of her means of defense against the German empire... our official silence from Berlin (save for a few troops camping in the British zone) and our very real absence from Potsdam have dealt this prestige an unnecessary blow. "Berliners," Le Figaro asserted, "must convince themselves rhythmically on the ruins of the Hitlerite empire, trade on the black market and hum the new song that Berlin will be reborn. They cynically endure democratic preaching on the theory that as long as they do so they will be fed, and they can count later on Allied generosity to give public ceremony back to their former position as a great power." In view of this, the German demand lost all weight "in the eyes of other nations," and even if they wanted to, "they could not immediately return to their former position without the consent of others."

The Berlin radio recorded unblanket coverage to announce that Germany was prepared to give up all claims to territory or industrial plant that would rise to $30 billion. In the Berlin radio, the German demand for reparations was not mentioned, and the German demand for control over the Ruhr was denounced as "a violation of the principles of justice." The Berlin radio announced that the German demand for reparations was "a violation of the principles of justice." The Berlin radio announced that the German demand for reparations was "a violation of the principles of justice."
12. Spain: Unhappiness concerning the fifth anniversary of "Spain's uprising for her independence." A commentary running: "virulent, cynical, oppressive, sub-human Communists."

13. Italy: The Italian home service carried a commentary asserting that Italians felt they have exploited their war guilt and that the air strikes, in making their decision, should consider the contributions made to victory by all peoples, "including those who have not fought two wars—one against their own government and another against the Germans."

14. Belgium: Commenting on the Potsdam Conference, London's radio programs dealt extensively of the "present state of the world" to the interests of the small countries, saving that until at least that truth and justice are not contemplated by present. It was reported that the British had not twice but had not issued any determination, and that there would be a session of Parliament at 1400 hours on voting, when the government would make a statement on the situation. The Belgian, if it is said, had already been informed of the text of the message "in which it is said that the royal's house to sign its post until after the elections." The press review said all papers had published reports on Roosevelt's trip through Europe and carried a film reporting the same that all reviviscs in Belgium, "after the long and interior front, they were given by Goebbels, looked forward to American ships, but so far we have seen hardly anything worthwhile."

15. Netherlands: A home service press review said the papers were discussing the Communism-Threatened policy and the two problems "closely connected with it" - the black market and people who shrink their work. A letter, talk by an Amsterdam schoolboy did not exclusively with the necessity of overcoming a general "misanthropic works."

Other broadcasts followed: a. A Finance Ministry announcement regarding blocked bank accounts and giving more would be exceptions for the needy; b. A talk by Prince Bernard appealing to members of the resistance to support the government in reconstruction efforts and to stand by for transfer into the regular forces.

As a sequel to this, the radio broadcast an interview with Staff Chief Colonel Poema stressing that "our new Dutch army is being organized on the British model."

16. Norway: HM declared that 700 young Poles, aged 17 to 22, were in a camp near Oslo, where they would "probably remain for another year." They had been conscripted for labor in Norway by the Germans and their education had been completely neglected, but there were teachers with them now in camp.

17. Japan: Tokyo transmissions to Europe: a. Opinion that Somis Moscow mission spells the doom of the US ambition for leadership in East Asia, for if the US enters into the Pacific war, the US will be forced to retreat there; b. Advised the Japanese war leaders to take "fullest cognizance" of the "tragic lesson" provided by the Potsdam declaration by plunging Germany into a two-front battle; c. Carried a Hibi article by the retired Lieutenant Ishihara declaring that "ever since the Manchurian incident, there has been too much officially inspired public opinion, while the press and other organs of public opinion have failed to function as they should. "This situation," Ishihara warned, "is bound to lead to inaction or resistance by the people."

1. Germany: Free Germany outlined the task of winning the support of all Germany for the aims of the anti-Fascist bloc. Berlin proclaimed that reconstruction would take six years, during which time German men must continue fighting for the work completed, although the work was said to be incomplete in a "different meaning." For the new following the fundamental shift of political power.

A manifesto of the Liberal Democratic Party called upon Germans for "invincible enthusiasm" in carrying out the new reconstruction. The party's aims included: a. Freedom of press and radio; b. Universal suffrage and secret ballots; c. The reconstruction of family life; d. Liberty of conscience; e. In relation to foreign countries, an exchange of opinions with other anti-Fascist parties. The responsibility of youth and women in reconstruction was emphasized. A Democratic Party was appointed by the Provincial Administrator. Berlin quoted a Soviet radio commentator on the Potsdam Conference.

An overtaking of ceremonies of German justice, Stuttgart carried Colonel Dawson's despatches pointing out that a new order of affairs the situation in the Ruhr area is able the judge.

2. Russia: Foreign propaganda comment on the San Francisco peace discussions, projected achievements of the Soviet system, denounced the "gerrymandering" of German political groups and attacked British, American and Italian papers for disregarding the situation in the Balkans. The home service carried a variety of home and foreign news.

Foreign broadcasts opined: e. In English: (1) The security Council is the cornerstone for the entire structure of international security. Controversies over its composition and voting procedure were essentially discussions as to who should bear the main responsibilities: opponents held that the projected charter minimized the rights of small nations sought to work the council, "completely ignoring" the fact that the small states primarily are interested in a reliable guarantee of peace. (2) People forget that markets to 1944 and two oceans wash the shores of the Soviet Union and that the Soviet Navy played its part in the victory. The experience after the last war and the enormous wealth hidden in secret plans raise the hopes of German imperialists that they can regain their former position, economic disarmament is therefore essential. (3) Polish reactionaries are reluctant to give up the lost right. b. In German: 3 had tried to "democratize the political corps" of the German and political groups such as those of Brueckner, Strasser, and Euckenburg must not be allowed to affect the political atmosphere of post-war Europe. c. In Italian: Reactionaries in all countries are ready to agree at peace, and more, now that the Potsdam Meeting is starting, these reactionaries are making a "last desperate effort" to break Allied unity by anti-British propaganda. Prominent among papers propagating for a Third World War, it was alleged, are: The Catholic World, The Catholic Weekly, The Catholic and the Italian Daily. In Greek: Reactionary papers in the U.S., Britain, and Turkey dislike "democratic developments" in the Balkans and make every effort to deceive the world about the true situation there. c. In Spanish: France tries to present itself as a democracy, but he cannot deceive the Spanish people.

Tass in French reported that Spaniards believed Hitler was hiding in Spain. A British (quoted by Tass in English) reported Dimbleby, British correspondent in Berlin, for forecasting "insurmountable difficulties" in allied collaboration in Germany.

3. France: expressions of disappointment and chagrin at France's absence from the Potsdam Conference continued to persist. French broadcasts. Recently, a home service commentator, declared there is "vague talk" about inviting France toward the close of the conference, "but if this gesture aims at informing our of measures already taken, it would be very platonic satisfaction." Home service commentator Gillois opined that Potsdam was more like a tea meeting than a peace conference. Deploying France's exclusion from the conference, Gillois declared: "There will never be a truly democratic international spirit until there is an international pelant, until the people choose directly their representatives on whom they censur sovereign power." It, Faisal can best defend his interests, said, by "defending principles to which will rally others by arousing throughout the world the atmosphere necessary for the democratization of society."

Commenting on a rumor that Hitler was alive in the Antwerp, Paris to the Middle East declared that in the latter, "you must admit that he cannot consider himself bated, and after all, he may not be entirely mistaken."

A.S.P. for Europe quoted a Washington dispatch suggesting that Stalin will present "Japanese peace proposals" to Potsdam. A home service press review quoted a La Voix de Paris prediction that Britain and the U.S. will exert pressure on the Soviet to participate in the war against Japan. In that event, the paper continued, the U.S. would turn towards the Far East, where the destruction of Japanese imperialism will open unlimited horizons to her.

Said: Valladolid broadcast Faisal's speech to the Sultan National Council in which he announced that in keeping with Spanish tradition only a "strong and flexible monarchy can solve all the difficulties the Netherlands may have to face," adding that "when the moment arrives, the Cortes will discuss a new regime and the nation will approve and proclaim a new law."

Italy: Justice Minister Forlani, in a broadcast from Rome, reaffirmed his intention of restoring independence and "justice" to the Italian judicial system. He said it was the task of the Constituent Assembly to guarantee freedom and rights to the peoples. A somewhat different viewpoint was contained in a home broadcast by Professor Pescarrelli, who maintained that the Fascists were never able to introduce the sweeping judicial reforms they planned because of opposition by Italian jurists. Therefore, Pescarrelli concluded, the present code is adequate for a democratic regime.

The Vatican: French transmissions noted "with pain" that there is a "pro-"statement of "Vatican: avancements" in France "directed against the church," referring specifically to a political movement circulated in France calling for the punishment of the servants of Satan, among whom "first come the leaders of the church." In justification, the Vatican quoted statements on the church by Nazi themselves and the collaborationist press, and cited the persecution of Christians by the Nazis. Even if the church in France was unjustly persecuted, "she will not die of it," the Vatican declared.

Turkey: A press dispatch from Istanbul to Moscow quoted a Yekhman statement that the Anglo-Saxons have become silent before the Russian demands. "Nobody will tell the Soviets, what right have you to preach other peoples' land? What about the pledges you gave, the documents you signed?"

Austria: Vienna Radio appealedFRANTICALLY for harvest volunteers, and State Secretary Nemon said that in some districts the "people seem rather tempted to follow and grumble and give it up as a bad job—but that won't get us anywhere."

Lines reported to the arrest of prominent Salzburg Nazis and the discovery of a huge dynamite store, and the increase of the Upper Austrian bread ration. Vossberg-burg announced formation of an Austrian democratic resistance movement.

Paris speculated on the Potsdam Conference's own and the likelihood of Russian intervention in the Far East. Austrians, satisfied with the Kanerner Government, were said to be looking forward to recognition. Moscow quoted State Secretary Fischer's article on the guilt of Anton Mussolin and revealed that Guido Schmidt is living in the countryside in St. Anton (Vossberg), although he is listed as a war criminal.

Poland: The home radio said the Polish press continued to report new incidents in Teshau. These incidents "contradict all principles" of democracy and free solidarity, it was asserted. The Moscow Embassy Radio said that although the Polish Government did not discriminate between all Army soldiers (who were on safe territory) and those who fought in the west, the First Army soldiers, who endured the "greatest sacrifices," earned a priority right to repatriation.

Czechoslovakia: Karel Opletal (quoted by the home radio) said the Potsdam Conference represented a "great opportunity and test" for the Big Three, on whose good-will and cooperation the fate of world peace will mainly depend. A Czechoslovakia: Belgrade in Belgrade, commenting on the Anti-Fascist North Conference, said Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Albania and Greece have found the "right path," but the Secretary General of the Conference in Belgrade added that the achievements of the Conference were not so impressive as to disturb peace in the Balkans. Belgrade announced that the tripartite Liberation Assembly's President was released by the Yugoslav Government, and other well-known Fascist officials were reinstated in the Yugoslav Liberal Party.

15. Athens: The home radio and dustbin papers stress the importance of the Potsdam Conference, which was viewed by all Greek and security-loving people with full confidence. The radio carried an appeal to the people to keep the position of Greece as a center of Fascism.

16. Athens: A cabinet editorial, quoted by the telegraph services in Greek, expressed doubt that the problems will be solved at Potsdam that the restoration will leave a major battle. Tehran radio was quoted as emphasizing Greek "inscriptions who will have to learn the same lesson the Albanians taught the Germans in defending their territory.

17. Crete: Athens said "20,000 inhabitants of Achaea passed a resolution in Athens, demanding the immediate liberation of northern Greece through occupation by Greek Allied troops." Further Athens telegrams quoted a London paper as stating that resolutions against the Greeks by the radio of Belgrade and Bulgaria were questionable, since both stations have already "not been outstanding in matters of truth"; b. The New York Daily Worker as stating that the United States should apply the 1923 agreement to Greece.

18. Belgrade: The home service carried the text of the letter sent by the King to the Premier, which was read by Premier Van Zeller to the Chamber. In the ensuing debate, fully reported in installments on Brussels radio, Van Zeller put forth the view that the national vote on abolition advocated by Leopold is unconstitutional. Van Zeller emphasized that the debate "implies weakening of the monarchy... which we need as much as bread." However, it is not for the King to decide by his will alone whether he does or does not reign." Van Zeller declared, proposing application of Article 82, which stipulates that both Chambers provide for the emergency in case the King "finds it impossible to reign." It was said the King had announced he would oppose any proposals aimed at the application of this article. Van Zeller closed the debate with an appeal to all Belgians to stand by the monarchy. Brussels further reported that two Catholic ministers resigned and that the left-wing Chamber groups reaffirmed their demand for abolition.

19. Japan: Dojto to Europe noted that the "enemy has recently intensified his propaganda warfare to incite ill-feeling against the Japanese among the Indonesian population and various southern regions." It was asserted, however, that "his propaganda is falling on deaf ears, because most Indonesians are well acquainted with the barbaric nature of the enemy invaders."
SUMMARY OF EUROPEAN BROADCAST TRENDS
(12 - 18 July)

For the first time Radio BERLIN pointed out to the German people that reparation for war damages would have priority over reconstruction at home. It was stated that already hundreds of thousands of German prisoners of war are "competing with one another to revive German honor" by their work in rebuilding Soviet towns and factories. The sincerity of their reparation efforts will determine the date of their return to Germany and eventually the withdrawal of Russian occupation troops from German territory, it was said.

As an impetus to coordinated effort in both reparation and construction work, BERLIN radio appealed for unity of the working class and close cooperation among political parties. A step in this direction was the announcement that four German parties had formed a united anti-Fascist bloc, preceding the war guilt of the German people and calling for a "new chapter in German history based on a democratic order."

In furtherance of the food drive, BERLIN noted the program of the Social Democrat Party designed to "get to the bottom of the manpower barrel" and to provide "helping hands" for the harvest. Everyone was urged to stop wandering around and to join in harvest labor groups. Communal work was reported starting on abandoned farms, and it was announced that the Communist Party's agricultural platform calls for the division of large estates among poor peasants, particularly those who had been ruined by the war.

Refuting the report the previous week in a British paper (quoted by the Soviet Radio) that a million-man German army was still under arms in SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN, HAMBURG radio stated that 600,000 German troops are held by the British as prisoners of war in this sector.

In broadcasts to Germany over Radio LUXEMBOURG, it was emphasized that leading German industrialists will be ferreted out and that they would show no leniency; that permission had been granted for meetings of the Communist Party in the American zone; and that with the start of the Big Three meeting and the cooperation of the four powers in governing Germany, Nazi hopes for an Allied split have been frustrated.

Anticipating the opening of the POTS DAM Conference, Russian home and overseas broadcasts strongly plugged Allied unity and declared that in the administration of Germany the four powers have demonstrated the capacity to collaborate "not only in waging war, but also in organizing the peace." PRAVDA, quoted by MOSCOW Radio, expressed confidence in the ability of the Big Three to preserve "lasting peace."
Stressing the strength of the United Nations Charter in comparison to the League of Nations, MOSCOW declared that the presence in the organization of the USSR and the US was a guarantee of its success. As a possible drawback to unity, MOSCOW pointed to plans for different Western European blocs, casting them as factors that would weaken Allied cooperation and would detract from the principal task of a joint effort in eradicating all remnants of Fascism.

Russian programs for Europe and overseas, beamed over an expanded network in Hungarian, Finnish, Danish, French, English, Czech, Turkish, Bulgarian, Persian and Spanish, warned against the "hot-bed of Fascism" in Greece, where every democratic manifestation is being suppressed; criticized the Argentine Government for its continued Fascist tendencies despite the invitation to SAN FRANCISCO; and insisted that Russia must participate in the TANGIER conference because of its "interest in the Mediterranean area" and its position as a "defender of the ideals of peace."

French radio programs and telegraph agency transmissions protested vigorously France's exclusion from the POTSDAM Conference, asserting that failure to receive an invitation had dealt a serious blow to France's international prestige. Several papers quoted over the radio even stated that without French representation at the conference table, the decisions reached will have "no value."

Although continuing its attack on Communism and denouncing a BBC talk advocating a democratic form of government for all nations, the Spanish radio made a strong bid for acceptance by the United Nations with the publication of the new Spanish Charter. The President of the Cortes, announcing its adoption, said it grants free thought, but not liberty that would be used as a weapon against Spain.

Uncasiness in the Balkans as a result of provoking actions by alleged Greek Fascists highlighted broadcasts from Bulgaria, Albania and other Balkan states. The Bulgarian home radio attacked Greece as a "danger to the peace" because of its aggressive demand for Southern Albania, while the Albanian station assailed "vestiges of Fascism" in Greece and asserted that the people are "ready to defend with their blood" what they have gained through sacrifice. The Greek radio, meanwhile, cited the persecution of Greeks in Northern EPIRUS and "atrocities" committed by the Albanians and appealed to the United Nations to oust the Albanian "maneaters" from "blood-soaked EPIRUS."

Turkish radio and press agency reports, stating that the question of the Dardanelles would be discussed at POTSDAM, insisted that the Turkish people violently object to Russia's request for special rights in the Straits and for territorial concessions. Although favoring international discussion of the problem, ISTANBUL at the same time urged that a Soviet-Turk pact be considered apart from settlement of the Straits question.

The Polish Radio, commenting on British and American relaxation of the non-fraternization ban, asked: "Have you suffered so little that you want to speak and drink with Germans who only recently were GESTAPO or SS men?"

Defending the evacuation of Germans and Hungarians from Czech territory, Premier FIERLINGER declared over the Czech Radio that it was being done with the consent of the Allies and that this action was necessitated by "Werewolf" activities of Germans in Czechoslovakia. It was stated that with the evacuation continuing at full speed, several towns in the border region already "have been made entirely Czech again."
1. Germany: The 20 July anniversary of the bomb plot provided the main theme of Soviet-controlled propaganda. The former prison chaplain in charge of Berlin's "Christian affairs" testified to the heroic bearing of the 20 July conspirators before their execution and stressed the shoulder-to-shoulder anti-Fascist struggle of the Communists, clergymen and noblemen. A Berlin commentator bewailed the "lack of loyalty" of the Germans involved in the plot towards anti-Fascist groups, including Communists, as responsible for the failure of the putch. Free Germany opined that the fight for Naziism's expiration was "only beginning." The Brandenburg President reproached local authorities for their lack of energy in the "political" harvest drive. Free Germany emphasized that the anti-Fascist bloc is developing into a "mass movement" and revealed the start of a "systematic propaganda" to youth. Berlin reported on the formation of a bloc of Communists and Social Democrats in Saxony. The Textiles Chief explained that the "true commercial spirit" was democratic.

Luxembourg carried a US Controller's statements: a. That German war industries would not be rebuilt or used for the Japanese war, but would be smashed for ever; b. That German patents will be available to the Allies.

2. Russia: Foreign propaganda attacked Argentine, Spanish and Greek Fascists and defended the Hungarian Government against English criticism.

Foreign broadcasts said: c. In Spanish: An invitation to San Francisco did not lead to the democratization of Argentina. It is regrettable that the "odd interpretation" of American solidarity by representatives of American countries should help to revive the Argentine Fascist Corps. d. In French: The Sunday Times correspondent was "purposely twisting" facts about Romanies and in stating that Hungarian Communists are the collusive masters in north Transylvania. According to Borba, Greek terror in Macedonia continues. e. In Italian: Spain remains a "festerous wound" on the body of Europe... now that the Spanish people enter the struggle for restoration of the Republic and democracy, the infamous Ceclinas would try to stop it "by dressing himself in royal garments." Donagani, one of the biggest war profiteers in Italy, has been released from prison. f. In English: The Young Albania Government's achievements are great: friendship between national minorities has increased; land was divided among the peasants; and illiteracy is being eliminated. The Slovenian Liberation Front Congress, comprising representatives of Austrians from Carinthia and Italians from Trieste, demands that the Slovenian Littoral and Trieste be reunited with Yugoslavia. g. In Persian: ayeneh followers engage in futile anti-Soviet intrigues in order to spoil good relations between Iran and Russia.

The home radio carried a Pravda editorial on the Soviet need for increased oil production. Ties for the Soviet press quoted the Greek Communist Party leader as saying Greek freedom exists only for a Black reaction.

3. France: Comment on Petösea subsided, the tenor of available material suggesting, however, continued irritation at French absence. AFP for Europe quoted the Turkish paper Ulus as asserting that the Big Three can make only provisional decisions regarding European frontiers, "since the countries involved will have to be consulted before anything can be decided." On pain of sacrificing the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

AFP for Europe declared that French policy in Germany is not yet crystallized as "French, before deciding, intends to observe for as long as possible the development of German political parties which will give valuable indications of the mentality of the Reich population." However, this much is certain: "France welcomes the territorial claims that the Reich's neighbors make—Danish claims on Schleswig, Dutch claims on the territories of northwest Germany and Poland's desire to extend her frontiers by expanding into western Germany." As for the Ruhr and Rhineland, AFP declared that their "separation from Germany is foreseen."

A home service commentary attributed to "US origin" recent reports of Lebanon's Christian hostility towards France. That these reports are groundless is proved by the definite Patriarch's plan on behalf of Lebanon's Christians that France be delegated by the great powers to protect Lebanon's independence, the commentator continued.

AFP for Europe noted the Greek request for Franco-British intervention in northern Epirus to prevent alleged Albanian atrocities.

4. Czechoslovakia: Prague reported a speech by Vice-Premier Gottwald made in the National Council. He said: "We expect the Poles to respect our pre-Jewish frontier, but we have a duty to treat the Poles differently than the Germans and Russians. They are 'Slaves' and therefore our brothers. They are entitled to have Polish schools in Czechoslovakia." Prague in English quoted the Czechoslovak leader saying the Czechs do not want to eradicate the entire German nation, "But we fear that German children will be taught by SS murderers how to handle knives and machine guns. The attitude of our soldiers will therefore be less trusting than that of British and US soldiers."

5. Poland: The home radio quoted Polish papers as demanding the extradition of war criminals, complaining the basis in American captivity live comfortably. The radio also reported: speech by Baizel, the Deputy Minister of Justice, who said the Poles do not want extermination of the German people, but demand the punishment of those responsible for Polish war losses. Lublin reported a Warsaw priest of God may not return home from Berlin. The home radio discussed prospects of resettlement in western districts.

6. Albania: The telegraph service in French quoted the President of the National Committee in London as stating Greek claims on northern Epirus are false and if the Greek Fascists cross the Albanian frontier they will receive a fatal blow.

7. Greece: The home radio ascribed the French paper L'Echo with the assertion that disunion between the Anglo-Americans and Russians is taking an "expansive turn"; it stated that France may send a big delegation with full power to Athens; quoted Larmer's promise of UNRRA aid for Greece.

8. Bulgaria: A transmission in Russian quoted Kared to the effect that Greece was the only exception to Balkan unity and that the "still existent Maghrebian ideas of capturing not only Bulgaria and Sofia, but even Greece." The paper also declared that Fascism is still alive in Bulgaria and called for its "merciless destruction."

9. Yugoslavia: The radio highlighted: a. A report that 150,000 participated in a one-day strike by the private anti-Fascist organizations against the undemocratic decisions of NS; b. The "Italian" Brigade's letter to Tito promising to defend the brotherhood of the Serbian and Yugoslav peoples against "anyone attempting to break it"; c. Reports that Nazis remain on municipal committees in Gorlitz; d. A report on a meeting of Austro-Americans in New York, attended by a representative of the Yugoslav Ministry of the Interior, at which proceedings were sent to the Yugoslav Government and the Austrian Government in Vienna.

10. Austria: The radio carried an announcement refuting Austrian currency rumors spread by "politically unreliable elements" and reaffirming that NS would continue to "reconstruct Austria's circulation in Austria." Vienna reported: a. A talk by state Under-Secretary Schindlmair explaining why the present system must be an example to the entire people in work for a democratic Austria; b. A report of German welcoming Soviet artists at the Kulturhof to "renew cultural contacts between Vienna and Moscow."

11. Spain: The home radio continued to extol Franco's speech and called Franco "Spain'savior, when France spoke, Vellalolde declared, the Spanish people have "found confidence in his command." A talk by a Labor Ministry representative said Spanish legislation has won the "most prominent place in the world." Madrid carried a special broadcast for Brazil, her "beloved sister country."

12. Italy: The radio carried seemingly contradictory statements on the Italian food situation by the Food Minister and Premier. The home service reported that Food Minister Nelli said it would be unwise to conceal that Italy is facing famine . . . the wheat harvest is not inferior to that of last year," but the former's lack of awareness of the danger of famine has resulted in dangerously small contribarricades to the market. The minister declared the Allies will provide 14,000,000 quintals, a "gesture which demonstrates their understanding." Premier Perri, on the other hand, (according to the telegraph service) said the harvest is "generally unfavorable" and called for Allied imports of at least 20,000,000 quintals, which may be extended to 25,000,000.

14. Belgium: The Chamber debate on Leopold dominated Belgium's output. The principal theme was the Premier's speech stressing that "all criticism which is being leveled against the King can be summed up under one heading: 'The King has not resorted as the whole country did in the face of the German invasion.'" Specifically, it was "acted by German victory" and held that everyone should submit himself to it; it. While disapproving of the setting up of a Belgian Army to fight Hitler, the King had nothing against some Belgians enrolling in the ranks of the Anti-Bolshevik Legion and their bearing arms against the country which was fighting our invader." Like the Premier, Socialist, Communist and Liberal participants in the debate emphasized their demand for Leopold's abdication had nothing to do with their faith in constitutional monarchy as the "cement" of Belgian unity.

15. Luxembourg: A press review cited that papers are charging the new batch taking was not fully representative because it did not include "anti-revolutionaries." The dropping of the Allied non-fraternalism policy was called a mistake. The radio also featured a talk by the Food Minister appealing for help in the harvest.

16. Denmark: First place on the radio was given to the Trade Ministry's announcement that talks would be closed until Friday. A speech by Finance Minister Jensen, explaining reasons and proposals for a "large-scale census of capital," stressed that increased control by revenue authorities was necessary to "find those tax payers with hidden or uncontrolled capital" accumulated during the German occupation. The radio also reported the dismissal of the Freedom Fighters detachment from the Western prison army duty for "taking the law into their own hands" by dismissing the prison personnel in the political department.

17. Japan: Demi to Europe asserted the "enemy's psychological warfare is too naive to fool the Japanese action," and said the leaflets "show so little understanding of Japanese psychology" that the authorities are allowing the newspapers to publish some for public criticism.

The world-famous German concert pianist, Walter Gieseking, has been barred from giving public performances in the American Zone of Occupation in Germany, according to an announcement today by Colonel C. R. Powell, acting chief of the Information Control Division, U.S. Forces, European Theatre.

An exhaustive investigation by the Division's intelligence section on the extent of Gieseking's collaboration with the Nazis revealed that, although he was never politically active in the Party, he permitted himself to be used as a cultural agent of the Nazi Propaganda Ministry in neutral and conquered countries.

His ideological association with the Nazi Party and government expressed itself in the support which he rendered to musical events arranged by the Party inside Germany, and in concessions of a purely artistic nature which he made in following the directives of the Propaganda Ministry.

As early as 1933, when a considerable amount of artistic criticism still was permissible in Germany and matters pertaining to the freedom of the arts and the prerogatives of the artist could still be aired publicly, Gieseking voluntarily gave piano recitals, without compensation, under auspices of the Nazi Party and attended by hand-picked fanatical Party members.

Every concert Gieseking gave abroad served a purpose which the Goebbels' office considered highly useful to the Nazi cause.

He voluntarily performed with orchestras that were under the complete control of the Nazis or under the auspices of Quisling societies, unlike other musicians who retired rather than collaborated.

Although recognized throughout the world as a great interpreter of French impressionistic music, Gieseking ceased playing it on the German stage at the behest of the Nazi propaganda bosses.

At the personal invitation of Hitler, he appeared at a reception in honor of Mussolini in 1937.

The black-listing of Gieseking by the American Occupation authorities resulted from the fact that he was not, like many other artists, merely an opportunist who in time became reconciled to the Nazi regime for reasons of making a livelihood. Gieseking, according to the record, was a firm believer in Hitler, and never wavered in his allegiance to him and to the Nazi system.

To permit him to perform publicly under license from the American Occupation authorities would, in the opinion of ICD, be tantamount to approval of his active collaboration with Nazis.

SOVIET TROOPS ARE INSIDE THE SUBURBS OF BOTH FRANKFURT AND KUESTRIN.

According to Allied reports, Soviet troops are inside the suburbs of both Frankfurt and Kustrin. Moscow is still silent about the existence of bridgeheads over the Oder in this sector, but press dispatches from the Soviet capital.state that Soviet troops are across the river and are moving to cut the principal highway from Frankfurt to Berlin. The German reported at least four Soviet bridgeheads and asserted that the Soviets have ferried tanks across at three of them.

ENEMY BROADCAST PROPAGANDA, TRENDS AND ANALYSIS
GERMAN HOME FRONT. WARNING THAT PRESENT SUFFERINGS CANNOT COMPARE WITH THE GREAT DEATH WAVE.
In his weekly editorial, Dr. Goebbels reiterated the high command's decision not to accept a capitulation offer because it would throw Germany on the "generosity of a pitiless and vindictive enemy."

Overtures were visible in the article of Lt. Gen. Ditmar's plea on Tuesday that Germany could not yield because present terms spell the annihilation of the German people. The most significant statement along these lines was: "Does anyone believe that the German command would ask its people to suffer to such an extent if there were any other way out of the threatening danger?"

Acknowledging that Germany had become a nation on the defense with not even the assurance of protection "in depth," the propaganda minister nevertheless blandly promised that victory would be "the reward for suffering and that Germany would emerge from the war "a nation of heroes."

His article served as the touchstone for a new atrocity campaign, as he reported that Germans overrun by the Soviet armies in the East had suffered "unpublishable crimes" at the hands of the Bolshevik invaders.

Once again he pictured Germany as the defender of the world against bolshevization and slavery, and reminded bourgeois Britain and America that they were blind to the danger they face in the East (Der Helle 2020).

The theme that a capitulation offer from the Big Three could not be accepted because it would be a repetition of "Wilson's attempt to lie the weapons out of our hands" was picked up again by Erich Blochshein in the midday "Review of the Situation."

"He knows the behind the moral and humanistic hypocrisy they are hiding the grinning mask of annihilation," he declared. (GHS 1233).

The announcement from the Roosevelt, Churchill, Stalin conference that plans were being made for a "lasting peace" drew criticism in a flood of transmissions which rejected the idea of the world's three "wars criminals" acting as "a child of peace."

PERMANENT EFFECT OF NAZI PROPAGANDA LINES:
GERMAN ATTITUDE TOWARD CURRENT HISTORICAL EVENTS

1. "What main propaganda lines have permanently penetrated the minds of the German people?" "In what important respects are the Germans ignorant of current history and world affairs?" No systematic study has been made to answer these questions. The answers below are a summarization of information available from other studies. They are not to be regarded as all-inclusive.

2. Propaganda successfully employed by the Goebbels' machine includes few, if any, new lines. Rather propaganda themes employed by other political groups in pre-Hitler days were modified or intensified. Many of these stream-lined efforts have left some residue in the heads of Germans, including sincere anti-Nazis.

a. Fear of Bolshevism. Fear of Bolshevism in Germany today, in the American Zone, is as great as the Nazis could have hoped. It turns up particularly in rumors about Russian atrocities and Russian plans to take over the American Zone. Russia is consistently and overwhelmingly the one place young Germans agree they do not wish to live.

b. The Fuehrer Principle. Although most Germans today reject their former Nazi leaders, many are still devoted to the Fuehrer principle as opposed to the Democratic principle. They feel that the only way for Germany to recover from her present plight, is to have a new, strong Fuehrer or at least strong Fuehrung (leadership). A large part of the German people still look to political organization along totalitarian lines.

c. The Stupidity of the "Masses". Many Germans today believe the "masses" stupid and easily misled, a point belabored by Hitler in Mein Kampf. Even anti-Nazi Germans who profess admiration for Democracy, still share with Goebbels, a lack of faith in the individual and, by implication, disbelief in the capacity of the people for Democratic Self-Government.

d. Cultural Superiority. Most Germans are eager to point out that they are a nation more cultured than their eastern neighbors, but also more cultured than the Americans. American values are regarded as "too materialistic".

e. Status of Women. The Nazi propaganda line that women's place is in the home is generally believed by Germans today. This viewpoint is shared by the German women, who show little sense of political or community responsibility and assume the attitude of the "Kleine Frau".

f. Power Versus Reason. Nazi propaganda rejected the Democratic ideology as "intellectual aerobatics and rationalism", in favor of "Power and Strength" and the mystical qualities of the German soul. Many Germans today continue to admire power above all else.

G. National Socialism in General. A large proportion of the German population believes that the basic ideas of National Socialism, or at least some of them, were not bad, but that they were not carried out properly. Many are still impressed with Hitler's solution of the unemployment problem and other social measures, and are unaware that the apparent economic benefits of National Socialism were by-products of war preparation.

h. Allied Plan. The constant claim of Nazi propagandists, particularly towards the end of the war, that the Western Allies as well as the Soviets were determined to annihilate Germany and exterminate the population, has not been too successful. With approaching winter, however, and the pressure of unsolved food and fuel problems, rumors to this effect receive a certain amount of credence. On the other hand, there are Germans who believe we will feed and otherwise take care of them if necessity dictates.

i. Attitude toward Hitler. Opinion about Hitler appears to be divided. One portion of the population professes great hatred for him. Other Germans of all social strata, continue to believe that Hitler himself was not a bad man but that he had evil advisors and treacherous executives. They continue to believe as Nazi propaganda told them, that he wanted only the best for Germany.

j. Racial Theory. While anti-Semitism in Germany does not exist to the degree Nazi propaganda sought to achieve and does not appear markedly stronger than in other countries, the majority of the German people cling to the Nazi view of German racial superiority. Excepting Scandinavians and Americans (i.e., "Nordic Races") most Germans consider themselves superior to the French, Italians, Russians or Poles. This opinion was found even among "re-educated" young prisoners of Compiègne, who otherwise displayed strong anti-Nazi views. A large proportion of the German people also continue to believe that some kind of degradation will result if different races mix.

3. Failures of Nazi Propaganda. It may be useful to enumerate some of the principal Nazi propaganda lines which proved almost total failures. The Lebensraum theory appears to have had little effect upon the population. It is a dead issue. Nazi attempts to de-Christianize the German population and substitute a kind of Nordic paganism appear to have had little permanent effect. There are many skeptics among the Protestant population, but practically no evidence of substitute Nordic religions. Finally Germans today are in total disagreement with Nazi claims that war is glorious. A certain admiration for soldierly qualities may remain but the reality of war has been experienced,
4. Ignorance of Current History. Regarding German ignorance of current history and world affairs, it must be pointed out that by and large, they are not so uninformed as they are misinformed or only partially informed. During the Nazi regime, the Germans were not without information on major world events but were misinformed by biased presentation, false interpretation, or selection of facts designed to lead to false conclusions.

a. The Outbreak of World War II. The principal misconceptions so far as current history is concerned center around the outbreak and course of World War II. A considerable number of Germans acknowledge that Germany was responsible for the outbreak of hostilities, but few are fully aware that their country, under Nazi leadership, deliberately planned and prepared the war. As to the course of the war, many Germans believe that victory was within grasp at various times had "mistakes" not been made.

b. The Origins of Aerial Bombardment. There is evidence that many Germans are misinformed about the beginnings of aerial warfare and its use against inhabited localities. Civilians as well as P.W.s have voiced the opinion that German attacks on London and Coventry were retaliatory measures against previous British bombing attacks on German civilian targets.

c. America's Entry Into the War. The majority of the Germans knew little or nothing about the reasons which compelled the United States to enter this war and to extend help to England before the beginning of hostilities. Many Germans do not even know that it was Hitler who declared war on the United States, but are under the impression that the United States declared war on Germany.

d. The Invasion of Russia. The majority of Germans, while realizing that it was Germany who attacked Russia, appear finally convinced that this invasion was inescapable act of preventive warfare. The Nazi argument that the overwhelming strength of Russia was proof of Russia's aggressive intentions against Germany has been one of the most successful propaganda lines.

e. Workings of Democracy. Concerning events in the United States and England, the Germans were given as many facts as the populations of the democratic countries were given about their countries. But most of the information given while true in itself, was so arranged, and is still so arranged in the German mind, that the final picture of democracy is false. To most Germans, including anti-Nazis, the structure and workings of democracy are entirely unknown.

f. The Treaty of Versailles. Next to the Jews, there is no single issue on which Nazi propaganda concentrated so much as the Treaty of Versailles. These propaganda efforts were partially successful. Most Germans know little about the facts underlying the treaty and react emotionally to the mere mention of the word. They know still less about the treaty of Brest-Litovsk where Germany imposed a super-Versailles on the Russians.

5. Conditions in Concentration Camps. It is doubtful whether the majority of Germans, even today, know what actually happened in the concentration camps. There are indications that a large number have not accepted or have rejected Allied revelations on concentration-camp conditions. The notion that conditions in the camps were not bad before the outbreak of war, and that "things got out of hand" in the course of general disintegration of the Nazi state is widespread. The fact that the concentration camps were places of systematic murder and torture from 1933 on, appears completely unknown.

5. An outstanding deficiency of the average German is the failure to connect cause and result. Thus a German may sincerely detest war and at the same time approve the Hitler Youth organization. He may be appalled by concentration-camp pictures and at the same time believe in National Socialist racial theories. He may be a sincere anti-militarist and at the same time approve the Nazi "bloodless victories" which led to war.

Speech by Adolf Hitler.

German Volksdeutsche and Volksdeutsche, National Socialists,

When President Hindenburg entrusted me with the chancellorship twelve years ago to-day, Germany was faced with the same situation internally as she is facing externally to-day. The Versailles Treaty had provided for the systematic destruction and impoverishment of the democratic republic and this had become a permanent phenomenon of seven million unemployed, seven millions of part-time workers, destroyed agriculture, destroyed commerce and a proportionately destroyed financial structure. German ship yards had become the graveyards of ships, the financial situation of the Reich threatened at every moment with danger the collapse not only of the state but also of the provinces and parties. At the most decisive factor of all was the following behind this systematic methodical destruction of Germany: the unique phenomenon of all the centuries, that at just as much as today a large scale, it was at that time on a small scale: the bourgeoisie was actually incapable of putting up effective resistance against this danger. He had not learnt even after the collapse of 1918 that an old world was collapsing and a new world being born.

It was not a matter of supporting by all means what had already proved its incapacity and tried to maintain it artificially, but that it had become necessary to replace it by something new. An out-of-date society has broken up and every attempt to maintain it had to be in vain. Thus, the situation was so different even as it is on a larger scale to-day, since bourgeois apologists continue to be exposed to destruction and only noble communities, namely, integral and well-disciplined, are able to overcome the severest European crises for many centuries.

I have only been allowed to enjoy six years of peace since January 30th 1929. Immeasurable things have been accomplished in these six years, and even greater things are planned by us for the next six years, and so gigantic things have been accomplished that they merely serve to intensify the hatred and the jealousy of our appeaser democratic neighbours. The most decisive accomplishment of those six years has been my power to stand the test of the German nation by stupendous efforts, international recognition, reparation for the victims of the war, peace, recovery, and exchange and transport simplification, i.e., not so much to equip it with a great material armament, but above all to fill it with the spiritual power of resistance in the interests of self-determination. The terrible fate which is unfolding in the east to-day and which is extermination by the tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands in towns, villages, and the working places, will be averted by us in the end in spite of all reverses and burdens if we concentrate upon our inner strength. But if that is possible at all then it is only because an internal change has taken place in the German people itself since January 30th 1929. If there were still a Germany of the Versailles Treaty to-day, Europe would have been swept away by the bolshevistic tide already. There is hardly any need to discuss anything with those stupid people who never seem to see who we are of the opinion that a docile Germany would not have become a prey of this Jewish-international conspiracy because of that very impotence. This means nothing else than to prevent all natural laws. If it ever happened that a harmless goose was not eaten by a fox because it could not have aggressive diseases like its constitution then a wolf is in ce and nourish such developing ideas in its education, and, what is worse, was able to give political influence to them. Long before National Socialism came to power the battle against Jewish-April Bolshevism was already in progress. If it did not already overrun Europe in the years 1919 and 1920, then only because it was still too weak and too unheard of at that time. Its attempt to eliminate India was not given up out of compassion for the ideas of that time, but only as a result of the last battle of dreams. Its attempt to eliminate Hungary was not achieved because the bolsheviks changed their mind, but because bolshevik power could not be maintained militarily. The attempt to break up Germany was also abandoned not because we did not desire to do so, but because one did not succeed in eliminating the remainder of the natural power of resistance of our people. It was, however, Judaism began with the internal corruption of our people and it found its best allies in those bourgeois who would not realise that the bourgeois age has passed for good and will never return. The process of uncontrolled liberalism has outlined its time and can only lead to complete collapse, but above all the great questions of the time can only be solved by the concentrated authoritative power of the whole of the nation based on the equal rights of all and consequently the equal duties of all. On the other hand, since the leadership has the same duties it must also claim the same rights. Thus, National Socialism, in the midst of a gigantic financial, cultural and social work of renaissance, has above all educationally given the German people those values which were the necessary premise for any military values. The power of resistance of our nation has increased so tremendously since January 30th 1923 that it can no longer be compared to former times. At all. The maintenance of this internal power of resistance is at the same time the physical guarantee of final victory. Germany has been saved by a terrible illness today, those states affected by it will either overcome it by the supreme exertion of their power of resistance or they will perish by it. Yet, even as we survive the climax of this illness only in a crisis which weakens his power of resistance to the highest degree also. But this only serves to make our will all the more determined not to be deterred by anything in this battle for the preservation of our people in the face of the most horrible fate of all times and to obey the command of the preservation of our nation faithfully and without any hesitation. The Almighty has created our people, and if we defend its existence we are defending the work. That this defence is connected with inexpressible suffering, misery and sorrow serves only to bring us yet closer to our people. Furthermore, it gives us that hardness which is necessary if we are to fulfill our duty even in the most terrible crises. i.e., not only our duty to that eternal and decent Germany, but also to those few without honour who separate themselves from our people. But, there is only one motto for us in this fateful battle: he who fights honorably can save his own life and that of his loved ones. He who betrays the nation will die a dishonourable death under all circumstances. That National Socialism was able to discover and horden that spirit in the German people is its greatest deed.
Socialist and fighter for my people, I should like to tell other statesmen once and for all that each attempt to affect National Socialist Germany through the use of Wilsonian misinterpretation takes for granted a naivety which is not known to the Germany of today. It is not decisive at all that in the democracies the political activity and the lie are appearing as inseparable allies, but it is decisive that every promise given by these statesmen to a people are to day altogether of no consequence, because they are no more in the position to hold any such promise. It is nothing else as if one sheep gives assurances to the other to protect it against a tiger. I repeat therefore my prophecy England will not only be not in the position to tame Bolshevism but her own development will go on more and more in this decaying disease. The spirits which were called by the democracies from the deserts of Asia will not let go of them. All the small European nations which capitulated due to the assurances of the Allies go towards their complete annihilation, whether their fate is meeting them somewhat sooner or later, measured on their inevitability is absolutely unimportant. Only tactical consideration induces the Kremlin Jews to go forward once brutally and in other cases somehow with moderation. The end will always be the same, but this fate will never be suffered by Germany.

The guarantee for this is the victory 12 years ago in the inner of our country. Whatever our enemies may devise however much misery they may bring to our German towns to the Germany and above all to our people, all this pales before the incorrigible grief and misfortune which would be overcoming us, if ever the plutocratic bolshevistic conspiracy would become victor. It is therefore on the 12th anniversary of our coming to power, even more necessary to fortify the heart more than ever before and to harden oneself the holy resolution to fight, regardless where and under which circumstances, so long until victory crowns our efforts. I also want, on this day not to let any doubt about something else. In spite of a whole surrounding enemy world I have once chosen a road with my conscience and wandered as an unknown without name until final success, often asked to be dead at all times wished dead, in the end still the victor. My life of to day also is exclusively determined by my duty. To sum up there remains only one and that is to work and to fight for my people from this duty only the one can release me who has called me. It was in the hand of fate to extinguish me and finish my life's work. That the All might protected me that day, I see as the confirmation of the order given to me.

I shall therefore continue this road in the interest of my people in coming years without compromise. I shall disregard danger to my personal life, carried on by the unshakable conviction that the All might cannot desert him whose only aim throughout his life it was to save his people from a fate which it has not deserved either because of its numbers or its importance. I appeal in this hour, therefore, to whole of the German people, above all, however, my old comrades and our soldiers to prepare themselves for an even greater defence until we shall once again be able to lay the wreath on the graves of the dead of this gigantic struggle, the wreath with the inscription: and you have yet been victorious. I expect every German to do his duty to the utmost that he brings every sacrifice which is asked of him and will be asked of him because it must be asked. I expect that every healthy man gives himself heart and soul to this struggle, I expect that every sick man an invalid or otherwise incapacitated works to the limit of his endurance, I expect that the inhabitants of the city forge the weapons for this fight, I expect that every farmer gives us the bread for the soldiers and workers, even if he has to cut down his own supply, I expect all women and children to continue supporting this fight with the utmost tenacity as they have done so far, and I direct myself with special confidence to German youth. If we thus form a united community we can rightfully approach the Almighty to ask him for his mercy and blessing. For no people can do more than that: that everyone who can fight, fights, and that everyone who can work, works, and that all sacrifice, filled by only one thought, to safeguard freedom, national honour, and thus the future of life. No ever harder the crisis may be just now, it will be mastered in the end in spite of all, by our unshakable will, our readiness to sacrifice and our capacities. We shall survive this misery, too, Europe will win this battle also, and not central Asia. Europe, headed by that nation which has defended Europe against barbarism the west for one a half thousand years and will defend it in all the future, namely, the Greater German Reich, the German nation.
Dear Mr. Markel:

This article is submitted with the idea that you may be able to use it in the magazine section next Sunday, 29 December. New Year's Eve two days later will mark the second anniversary of the Hitler speech on which this is based.

The author, Dan Edelman, was chief editor of the Monitoring Unit attached to the Publicity and Psychological Warfare Detachment, 36th U.S. Army Group. There were some 25 British and American soldiers in the Monitoring Unit, most of them German born, who listened 24 hours a day to the German home, forces, and overseas broadcasts, who received the heillschreiber radio report by tape direct from the Propaganda Ministry in Berlin, and who also took the domestic and overseas Morse report.

This material was translated into English and each night prepared in a report form called "Enemy Broadcast Propaganda Trends, and Analysis." This report was utilized by Psychological Warfare units with the separate armies and by the General and Special staffs at Army Group for intelligence purposes. It was sent by teletype each morning to the various Army headquarters.

The Hitler speech was recorded in the course of this work. The report submitted herewith is written on the basis of a document which Edelman himself prepared on the 1st of January 1945.

Very sincerely,

Dan Edelman
RAIJ HAMBURG, 10 January— In the face of criticism from musical circles over the blacklisting of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, Germany's foremost conductor, Brigadier General, Berlin, Director of the Information Control Division, Office of Military Government, U.S. Zone, today explained that Furtwaengler had been refused permission to appear in the U.S. Zone because he had held public office under the Nazi regime and had permitted his art to be used by the Nazi Propaganda Ministry as a symbol of Nazi culture.

"It is an undisputable fact," said the General, "that through his activities Furtwaengler was prominently identified with Nazi Germany. He served as vice president of the Reich Music Chamber and held the position of Staatsrat, an honorary title accorded to outstanding figures in German life. He was also one of the leading advisors to the Propaganda Ministry on musical activities sponsored by the Nazi regime. Therefore, it is inconceivable that he should be licensed by Military Government, which is attempting to wipe out every trace of Nazism in German life."

As further evidence of the esteem in which Furtwaengler was held by the Nazi regime the General cited a memorandum from Dr. Goebbels dated 22 February 1945, a copy of which is now in possession of IOD, in which the Propaganda minister stated he does not "see any reason why his (Furtwaengler's) salary should be reduced" and that he intends to have the conductor's pension adjusted on a state-grant basis.

Formerly conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic and director of the Berlin state opera, Furtwaengler resigned both positions in 1934 when he was criticized for opposing attacks in the National Socialist newspapers against the composer Hindemith. Confronted at that time with the possibility of emigration under Nazi condemnation, he chose rather to reestablish his position with the Nazis.

At a conference several months later with Dr. Goebbels, Furtwaengler agreed to apologize publicly for his stand, and in return was permitted once again to appear in Germany as an "independent, non-political conductor." This reconciliation resulted in Furtwaengler's denunciation by the American press in 1936 when he was considered for the post of conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Furtwaengler's record from that time until virtually the end of the war shows repeated performances in connection with Nazi-sponsored programs. According to Furtwaengler's own admissions, made public in a statement he issued recently from his refuge in Switzerland, he conducted "Die Meistersinger" in Munich for a Nazi Party Assembly in 1937; he led the Vienna Philharmonic in Berlin in 1938 which was a Party performance in celebration of the Anschluss; he conducted at a concert commemorating Hitler's birthday in 1942; and in September 1945, he conducted at a Party memorial concert for Anton Bruckner. Furtwaengler also appeared frequently at the Bayreuth festivals; and their concerts arranged by the Nazi workers' associations and relief societies.

Throughout this period, Furtwängler likewise travelled extensively under the aegis of the Propaganda Ministry to perform in such countries as Sweden, Switzerland, France, Italy and Hungary. He was known as the "Music Pope" in Austria because of his position as director of the music life of Vienna, and participated in December 1941 in a Mozart festival in Vienna attended by Nazi leaders Goebbels, Goering, and von Sharich and representatives of the Nazi-dominated countries, which was played up in a Berlin music magazine published early in 1942 as a grandiose propaganda affair.
Nuremberg, January 15, - Brigadier General Robert A. McClure, G.S.C., Director of the Information Control Division, Office of Military Government (U.S. Zone) tonight revealed that in the next six months Germans themselves will be given more and more responsibility for the operation of German information services.

After June 30, the chief function of Information Control Division will be to set policies and to exercise overall supervision and control of the German-operated information services.

The changeover, in which the burden of operating newspapers, publishing houses, theaters and other information services will fall squarely upon the Germans, is the result of instructions from Lt. General Lucius D. Clay, the Deputy Military Governor. These instructions were to the effect that plans be put into operation for the assumption of information control responsibilities by German agencies to the maximum point consistent with protection of American interests in Germany.

Under this plan, General McClure said, DANA (Deutsche Allgemeine Nachrichten Agentur), the American-controlled news agency, will be licensed to Germans on or about March 31. Certain other activities will be turned over to the Germans progressively.

He said that on June 30 the following activities in information control will be continuing ones: publication of three magazines, publication of one zonal newspaper, the production of one quadripartite newsreal, programming and relaying for the radio network during such hours as are reserved for overt U.S. use.

General McClure said that after June 30 field units will still have responsibility for supervision and that ICD will also have responsibility for policy direction and control in the American Zone.

He said the forms of control which are now in effect and will continue to be in effect include the prevention of the circulation of material which is anti-democratic, which contains Nazi, militaristic or extreme nationalist views, or which tends to create dissension among the Allied powers. Regulations also prohibit the circulation of scandalous, libelous or malicious information.

The responsibility for legislation and police control over these matters will be charged to the Landcr presidents.

In this connection, General McClure emphasized the principles under which German newspapers are already operating - these principles he termed those of the "nearly free press." He pointed out that there was no censorship and that within certain limitations German licensed newspapers were allowed to print what they liked.

General McClure said: "There has been widespread misunderstanding on this point. The German licensed press is no longer operated by Americans, but by Germans themselves. They are subject to no censorship but only to post-publication scrutiny. This policy is a result of the Potsdam Agreement and of directives from General Eisenhower which provided that this agreement be put into effect as rapidly as possible."

General McClure reviewed six months of ICD's operations since its inception on July 14, 1946, as the successor to Psychological Warfare Division, SHAEF, and also explained the general program of ICD up to June 30, which includes the delegation of operational responsibilities to Germans themselves.

He also announced that every effort is being made to open the German press and radio in the American Zone of Germany to all United States and Allied news sources wishing to service them. Three wire services (Associated Press, United Press and International News Service) and the overseas edition of the New York Times have already made interim arrangements for exchange of certain news files with DANA.

DANA is the German news agency, with headquarters in Bad Nauheim, which will be a licensed German enterprise as the cooperative service of all the licensed newspapers. General McClure pointed out that any United States or Allied news syndicate or individual news source is free to enter into an interim arrangement with DANA, or make preliminary negotiations with the individual licensed newspapers. The Trading with the Enemy Act prevents servicing of German enterprise newspapers or agencies directly by the American agencies. As soon as legal restrictions are overcome, these arrangements made with DANA may be terminated, and arrangements may be made as individually preferred by news services.

In closing General McClure said: "The job of establishing a strong, free and democratic press in Germany is one that belongs to the Germans. We are here to help them do it, but not to do it for them. Our job is to supervise and control."
FAD HAMBURG, 9 JULY—In the face of criticism from musical circles over the black-listing of Wilhelm Furtwängler, Germany's foremost conductor, Brig. Gen. Robert A. H. Lucas, director of the Information Control Division, Office of Military Government, US Zone, today explained that Furtwängler has been refused permission to appear in the US Zone because he had held public office under the Nazi regime and had permitted his art to be used by the Nazi propoganda machine as a symbol of Nazi culture.

Confronted at that time with the possibility of emigrating under Nazi conscription, he chose rather to reestablish his position with the Nazis.
At a conference several months later with Dr. Goebbels, Furtwängler agreed to apologize publicly for his past, and in return was permitted once again to appear in Germany as an "independent, non-political conductor." This reconciliation resulted in Furtwängler's denunciation by the American press in 1936 when he was considered for the post of conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

According to Furtwängler's own admissions, in a public statement he issued recently from his refuge in Switzerland, he conducted "Die Meisterklugor" in Luxembourg for a Nazi Party Assembly in 1937; he led the Vienna Philharmonic in Berlin in 1938 at a special Party performance in celebration of the Anschluss; he conducted at a concert commemorating Hitler's birthday in 1938; and in September, 1941, he conducted at a Party memorial concert for Anton Bruckner. Furtwängler also appeared frequently at the Bayreuth festivals and at concerts arranged by the Nazi workers' associations and relief societies.

Though this point, Furtwängler's life is involved extensively under the reign of the Propaganda Ministry to perform in such countries as Sweden, Switzerland, France and England. He was known as the "Music Pope" of Austria because of his work associated with the Vienna Philharmonic in 1933, the record festival arranged by Nazi leaders Goebbels, Goering and Von Schirach, and the conducting of the Third Symphony.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Kurt Knappertsbusch, German conductor who has been serving in recent months as General Music Director of the Bavarian State Opera, has been forbidden to conduct in the US Zone and has been ordered removed from his post, according to announcement by Colonel C.R. Powell, Acting Chief of the Information Control Division, United States Forces, European Theater.

Originally permitted to perform because his record showed he had never been a member of the Nazi Party or affiliated organizations, Knappertsbusch has now been black-listed after further investigation, said Col. Powell. It was learned that he participated extensively in Nazi-sponsored musical activities both inside Germany and abroad thus lending effective and active support to the Nazi cause. Because his concerts were supported by the Propaganda Ministry and in many cases were held in conjunction with quasi-political rallies, it must have been obvious to Knappertsbusch that his concert appearances were being made for propaganda purposes, the Colonel declared.

Between 1936 and 1944 Knappertsbusch traveled extensively in Europe to make concert appearances. In all cases, his tours were arranged by the Propaganda Ministry, which agreed to reimburse him for any financial losses he sustained in leaving Germany, and he was obliged to report to the German Embassy upon arrival in a foreign country.

After conducting in Spain in 1936, Knappertsbusch went to Austria, where he continued his work after the entry of Nazi troops and where he was offered the post of Director of the Vienna Opera. In subsequent years he served as conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra, taking it on propaganda tours.
tours through France, Spain, the Balkans, Italy, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland and Poland. His last appearance outside Germany with the Berlin Philharmonic took place in Paris on 14 June, 1944, five days after Allied troops had landed on the Normandy coast.

During the same period, Kneppertebusch maintained an active schedule inside Germany and was generally accepted as the most popular conductor in the country during the Nazi regime. He made numerous appearances at Party-sponsored functions, which were designed to aid the Propaganda Ministry in exploiting the German love of music for propagandistic purposes. One of the outstanding programs of this nature was the "Mozart Week" in Vienna from 21 November to 5 December, 1941, for which Kneppertebusch served as conductor and Dr. Goebbels and Reichsleiter and Hitler Youth Leader Baldur von Schirach were sponsors and leading participants. The German monthly music periodical, "Die Musik" reviewed in its issue of January 1942 the speech of Dr. Goebbels describing the significance of Mozart's music to Germany, Europe, and the entire world, and noted that the performance by Hans Kneppertebusch and the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra "rounded out musically" the Goebbels talk.

Similarly in Dusseldorf, in May 1939, Kneppertebusch conducted for the "Reich Music Days," the annual gathering of the German musical world, at which Dr. Goebbels again introduced the musical festival with a "political-cultural-speech."

1. It seems to me the best way to comply with your request for background information on Intelligence activities is through this informal memorandum. I will try to explain some of the thinking which has gone into the direction of our denazification and other Intelligence activities.

2. The philosophy of information control denazification had its roots really in the activities of the Psychological Warfare Intelligence officers during the combat phase. The First Army, Third Army, Ninth Army, and Twelfth Army Group, many of the officers and civilians who are now directing Intelligence activities for ISD gained their insight into the German character. You will remember that we were with First Army landed in Normandy on the third day of the invasion and began our interrogations of Hitler's supermen. The record of interrogations which we built up in the months of campaigning which followed have stood the test of time because before we ever reached the German border we had a great deal about the Nazi mind, which we began an addiction of black and white Germans, their bands and when we came to Germany and began to talk to civilians we saw a great deal about the motives of the German citizen.

Psychological Warfare Intelligence officers made a study of the German administration which we set up in Aachen. They discovered that our Army had not chosen too wisely. The Psychological Warfare Intelligence report, which pointed out that the people who were put in power in Aachen and the other small towns of the Rhineland were of dangerous German types, focused the attention of Military Government on the problem of selection. This was fortunate in having an abundance of German speaking personnel of a high caliber. Whoever these men went in the first days of the occupation of Germany they were seized by IS officers to aid in the establishment of political acceptable city administrations. All of this experience was in good order, for we saw at first hand how easily mistakes could be made in choosing personnel.
4. We began screening personnel for the German information services which were set up by Twelfth Army Group. We began with a healthy dislike for Germans in general. We also had a good background material on the social and political trends in Nazi Germany and some definite ideas on the behavior of individuals in the Nazi atmosphere. When Twelfth Army Group was dissolved and SHAPE Psychological Warfare Intelligence came into Germany, the men who had been working in the field brought their ideas into the Information Control Division.

5. Philosophy has been that only one who was a member of the Nazi Party or of its affiliate agencies had been a participant in the greatest criminal conspiracy the world has ever known. As such the individual is deserving of punishment. Some active participants deserve more severe punishment than the small fry. With this in mind, we have sought to impose sanctions on the Nazis in accordance with the seriousness of their offense. I always tried to find an active anti-Nazi who had suffered at the hands of the regime to fill a job. Thus, in an orchestra we have fired the musicians who belonged to the party, even though they claimed they were forced to belong. We have rebuilt the orchestra wherever possible with men who had the courage not to belong to the Party. The first orchestra we screened was the Frankfurt Radio Symphony. It was run by a shyster character who had belonged to the SS. He was waiting for his day in court in Nuremberg when he was found with the fighting troops. Our first act was to kick him out of town. Then we began to examine members of the orchestra one by one. When the screening was finished, the orchestra was completely wrecked. What had been a symphony could hardly have formed a dance band. There was weeping and wailing, but we told them to go out and find clean musicians and rebuild the orchestra. One Sunday I heard the Ober Kassischer Symphony Concert on Radio Frankfurt. It is a first-class orchestra and it is politically clean.

6. The information services in Germany are a powerful instrument for those who would mold German public opinion. It is obvious that great care must be taken in the selection of the Germans to whom such power is to be entrusted. It may not make a great deal of difference whether a city's transportation system is run by a man who believes in Deutschland Uber Alles, but it would be a serious thing if a local newspaper, a radio station, or a theater were influenced by German national thinking. Therefore we set the highest possible standards, had no illusions when we started picking newspaper editors, and the difficulty of finding the kind of person. There is nothing so rare in Germany as a man who will admit he is a Nazi -- unless it is a man who really is not a Nazi. The first job was to find the small groups of experienced newspapermen who had not been doing any work in their field under the Nazis. Then, one had to shock and double check their backgrounds and their attitudes. Intelligence Detachment interrogated the men, interrogated their friends and their enemies. It was hard and thankless work. The job of the Press Branch was to re-establish new German newspapers. The Intelligence Branch was responsible for investigating all candidates. Since both their jobs were serious, there naturally arose differences of opinion. The Press Branch would find men who had nothing derogatory on their record, and the Intelligence Branch would try into some small suspicious circumstance. It would note, perhaps, that the income had doubled or trebled under the Nazis.
Investigating this, it would find that the source of part of this income had been Nazi, and going even deeper into the case would uncover real Nazi activities on the part of the individual.
Naturally and often too happily the Press Branch would take up its search for another man. More records, the Intelligence people added. One thing that stood out immediately which was somewhat complified the problem was that the man with the best anti-Nazi records were on the Leftist political persuasion. It is not too hard to find a Communist who has been an anti-Nazi. There are many Socialists who fought the Nazis, but it is rare indeed that one finds a Conservative who really stood out against the regime.
Since it was the objective to report all shades of political opinion in the newspapers, the greatest problem appeared in trying to find clean Rightists. Since most Germans favored the Nazis and since the Party machine included most of the best planners in Germany, it would be foolish to say that these newspapers are populated by the ablest Germans available. But we knew that they are run by anti-Nazis. If the newspapers are not quite as good as they might be, they are politically sound. There has been no compromise in the selection of personnel. Expediency has never figured in the choices made.

The selection of book publishers was even more difficult than the newspaper publishers. All of the book publishers in Germany were creditors under the Nazis. The Nazis ran German paper supply and the publisher who did not serve the Party's bidding just went out of business. It was extremely difficult to find any man who had received of the technicalities of book and magazine publishing who was not somehow compromised with the Nazis, but here again, and not without anguish, we have taken to our book publishers. Perhaps we have not even by many books and magazines published in Germany as were formerly. This is because we are a little leery of giving licenses to men who are compromised. These people who have been licensed at least are doing a job that is generally a job that they will not fail at politically.

The field of theater and music has been interesting and complicated. The question immediately arises in dealing with artists as to whether a man who plays a piano beautifully should be prevented from doing the same because of his political beliefs. A man not at all \( \ldots \) for the so-called \( \ldots \) in the second place that the Nazis have justly considered the activities of these people. We reconstructed the picture of the Propaganda Ministry's organization, which reached down into every hamlet in Germany to martial the musical talents of the Nazis in support of Nazi propaganda. German musicians were sent abroad for no other purpose than propaganda. It was decided that the cause was quite clear. The basic political line to hold because people still have to think that a German artist is merely an artist, but we have to hold to it. The officers of the propaganda, a letter written by a Bavarian conductor, have been thrown out of his job by us and practically all of the members of the orchestra had been fired. He wrote that he was now playing the violin in one of the back rows of the orchestra that he used to lead. Most of the faces in the orchestra were new. The interesting thing was that he voiced no complaint. It was a clear example of how life. In our music section was asked to appear as a guest conductor. This happened a few days before the performance. For rehearsal, everything was done as if another final rehearsal for a couple of days later. But in the meantime, the Intelligence Section had been screening the orchestra. The officers went to the podium for the dress rehearsal, raised his baton and glanced to the left and right. He was frozen in horror because the brass section was entirely absent and there were great holes in the string section. He discovered the orchestra had been screened. The performance was postponed. The effect of all this was to bring into German musical and theatrical life a new group of people. Many of these musicians we have suffered at the hands of the Nazis. They may not be as skilled as the old hands. It may very well be that the people of Germany are not hearing music played as well as before, it may be that they are not seeing such good theater as they need to see, but what they hear and what they see comes to them through anti-Nazis.

Determining whether a man is a Nazi or an anti-Nazi is the most difficult task that could be assigned to Germany. The difficulty lies in the fact fifteen years of deception. We are not usually naive but we must confess that we are often fooled by the elaborate stories that are told to us. Our objective in choosing people for important jobs
In order to find a man who is absolutely clean, a man who will never compromise with nationalism and reaction, even if it go off and leave him to stand alone, the most thorough investigation of any background leaves one with a sense of dissatisfaction. You can never be sure that you have all the truth. In the case of a candidate who has been investigated by a candidate is accurate. According to the Ottawa Medical School of two months, marks on his record. He will explain his position by telling an agent of the investigating circumstances. For a candidate for a published license, he will state a case which shows that he belongs to a Nazi student's organization. He explains that he joined in order to get a scholarship to a university. This is the only mark on his record. He explains that this is not the case. This is the only mark on his record. He explains that this is not the only mark on his record.

The Bad Orb screening center was established in 1945, a few months after the end of World War II. The purpose of the center was to identify and eliminate individuals who were suspected of being Nazi collaborators or sympathetic to the Nazi regime. The center was run by Dr. David Levy, a psychiatrist and expert on German political organization.

The screening process at the Bad Orb center consisted of a three-day session, which included a psychiatric interview, a physiological examination, and a series of psychological tests. The interview was conducted by Dr. Levy, who aimed to get a complete picture of the candidate's character and personality. The candidate was given several tests, including a standard intelligence test, a test for detecting Nazi and anti-Semitic attitudes, and a test for detecting alcoholism. Each test was designed to reveal the candidate's past and present orientation.

The psychological examination aimed to determine whether the candidate was telling the truth, and to evaluate his explanations for any inconsistencies. For example, in the case of a candidate who had been a student in a student organization, it was noted that he was extremely ambitious and idealistic and concluded that there was no reason to doubt that this was an active role in joining the organization. His three were anti-Nazi and anti-Nazi sentiments. After a few weeks of operation of the screening center, it was felt that we had at last found the answer to all of the problems of denazification.
Then if one came out of this place we were absolutely certain about his background. One went into the depending records looked alike. We were able to discern close associations with Nazi leaders, sometimes even with Hitler, whom none of us showed on the record. The men who went in these records—look, too, you see, we were able to demonstrate clearly that they were anti-Nazis. It took about twenty soldiers to put the screening center and we planned to send all important candidates to this place. Unfortunately, the soldiers were not re-deployed and it was necessary to revise the plans closed us Bad Orb and Dr. Levy and three assistants took to the road with a handful of jeeps. They were doing their screening on a modified basis. It would be fair to say that it is as effective as it was at Bad Orb. I think I may be able to re-establish a screening center in the American Zone again.

We have learned a great deal in the nearly two years of dealing with the Germans. One thing that I know very strongly is that the real war was not Nazi but German. Naziism, itself obviously evil, was merely the flowering of a seed which had been planted in Germany many decades ago. While trying to root out Nazi we are also trying to get rid of those Germans who are convinced that Germany should rule the world. This means that in a long, complicated, class-conscious every German is a German.

I'll return the article by H. shortly. You may have difficulty in recognizing it.
Typical public opinion surveys conducted during recent weeks have shown that 97 per cent of the Germans favor religious education in the schools; that principal concerns of a majority of Germans are shortages of food, unemployment and the absence of prisoners of war and missing relatives and friends; and that of the 50 per cent of Germans who had heard about land reform in the Russian zone, most thought it was advantageous there, but were opposed to any change in the status of property ownership in the US Zone.

Current public opinion surveys now being made include: attitudes of the Germans toward reconstruction; opinions concerning Die Neue Leitung, attitudes toward the Nuremberg trials (for comparison with an earlier study on the same subject); reactions to the concentration camp film that has just been shown for a week in Bavaria; a study of radio listening throughout the US Zone; attitudes toward federalism as against centralization; and attitudes toward co-operation among the four occupation powers.

In conjunction with the public opinion surveys, a team of special interrogators, all of whom are US civilians or enlisted men, interviews German Burgermeisters, civil administrators and political and religious leaders. These interrogations are designed to disclose the reactions of German opinion leaders to specific MG regulations and to obtain first-hand their report on how these regulations are being carried out in their respective communities. Furthermore, the opinions expressed by these articulate Germans reflect current trends of thought among the people and frequently offer an insight into reactions that may be expected to other projected regulations.

In some cases, the subjects studied by special interrogators parallel those being handled by the Opinion Survey Unit (e.g. study on the German left wing by the Survey Unit will be augmented by interviews with licensed German editors on reactions to the US-published paper). At other times, the special interrogations will cover entirely different fields (e.g. current interviews with the Catholic clergy on attitudes toward the occupation).

Among the topics on which special interrogations now are being conducted are the following: plans for handling the Jewish question in such cities as Frankfurt, Stuttgart and Munich; reactions of German leaders to the recent elections; interview with Pastor Nieholler; interviews and coverage of the Youth Conference at Treysa; and plans of the Social Democratic leaders.

As another aspect of the Special Studies group, intensive studies of the German personality are being made by American university sociologists attached to I.G.'s Intelligence Branch.

Dr. and Mrs. David Hodnick, of Columbia University, who are stationed in the town of Ehrenfriedel, near Kassel; and Dr. William Lipkind, of Ohio State University, who is stationed in Miesbach, near Munich, have been living among the people in an attempt to reach definitive conclusions on the patterns of thought of individuals and of groups and the relationship between current ideology and the indoctrination and experiences of the past 13 years. While investigating the extent of Nazi symptoms in community behavior, the sociologists will also observe any favorable trends toward democratic reorientation.

In general, the Hodnicks are concentrating on examinations of the life history of individuals, while Lipkind is studying family, group and community structure. In recent weeks, the Hodnicks have studied certain characteristic German types, such as a German intellectual who disdains the "stupid" masses and an old-line German nationalist. Lipkind has observed election preparations in Miesbach, the attitudes of various party leaders, the reactions to Bavarian separatism and the attitude of Bavarians toward the Prussian type. His most recent studies are concerned with differences in family form found among the various socio-economic classes.

Editorial.

Original material supplied by the Opinion Surveys Unit, the Special Interrogators and the sociological research workers, as well as intelligence received from ICD Decree teams and such other sources as Military Government summaries, G-2 reports, US Civil Censorship intercepts and the Strategic Services Unit reports, is summarized by the Editorial Section of ICD's Intelligence Branch in the Weekly Information Control Intelligence Summary and the Daily Intelligence Digest. Another feature of the weekly, called "Information Services in Germany", is devoted to an evaluation of press and radio output and film, theater and music performances presented in the four zones of occupation.

The weekly summary is sent to all General and Staff officers in the US zone as well as in Berlin, and serves as a guide in the government of the occupation zone.

TO: Mr. Toombs, Chief, Intelligence Section

1. Hereewith is summary of applications by defendants at Nuremberg for witnesses and documents, with reasons why they believe those witnesses and/or documents relevant to their respective cases.

2. Since there were many hundreds of such applications, an attempt was made to choose only those which presented the general outlines of the defense which each defendant will offer. That is, witnesses and documents were selected which reflect the various aspects of each individual's defense — both from point of view of defense in the different positions he held in the Nazi regime as well as in the framework of the indictment—that is, his defense against such charges as crimes against humanity, war crimes, crimes against the peace and crimes against international law.

3. The summary in most cases consists of a reduction in the number of applications presented here. For the most part when a specific application was selected, it was used in complete form.

4. It will be noted that applications of 20 defendants and several applications for defense of organizations are included. The Tribunal states that there have been no applications entered for Hess nor for defendant in absentia, Bormann.

5. Presentation of these defense lines at the present time should give Information Control Division at least a month to prepare a program for coverage of this aspect of the trial. All parties consulted both here and in Nuremberg agree that some positive action must be taken by I.C.D. to ensure that the German people do not forget the prosecution's case during the defense period nor that its effect be lost in any sympathy engendered by defense counsel.
6. Under normal conditions, correspondents would present the case for the defense factually, just as they had the case for the prosecution. German reporters at the trials, in fact, have been trained to report objectively. However, the German people cannot be trusted sufficiently as yet to permit day after day of this defense reporting without any mitigating material.

7. Therefore, on the basis of this report, an effort must be made to prepare a series of articles to be released through DANA during the defense period that will present the opposite side of the arguments by defendants, basing these stories on evidence entered earlier in the court by the prosecution. Similarly, policy of I.C.D. should orient licensees to make the same effort in editorials and features, taking up some of the defense arguments and preparing their own rebuttals. This combined effort would obviate any holiday for the Germans from the prosecution’s evidence and from the principal objectives of this trial.

8. Examination of these applications discloses that the defendants will not base their case on old Goebbels propaganda lines, that is, there will not be any plea of justification because of colonies, Versailles, Lebensraum, etc. Thus, it will not be necessary to enter into old arguments. However, each defendant has prepared a logical and carefully documented case and it will require considered judgment and keen insight in order to break down their cases in the press. It must be pointed out that I.C.D. will receive little help in this direction from court coverage, since the prosecution plans in most cases to let its case stand and not to interrupt the defense with cross-examination unless absolutely necessary. I.C.D. will be faced with the problem of digging through the minutes of the trial and preparing its own rebuttals with which to counteract the defense.

SUBJECT: Summary of Applications by Nuremberg Defendants for Witnesses and Documents.

T O: Chief, Intelligence Section, Information Control Division.

1. Organizations.

Lawyer for political organizations requests document called "Court of Justice and Rights" by Public Prosecutor Krylenko, Moscow, to show relation of Communist party organizations to the Court of Justice, thereby proving similarity in Nazi juridicial structure with Soviet rights and thus of non-criminal character of organization.

Defense for Nazi party asks document "History of Communist Party," published in Moscow, to show similarity in juridicial structure of Communist party and NSDAP as proof of non-criminal character of party organizations.

Defense for political leaders requests Paul Wegener, former Gauleiter of Weser-Ems to show that overwhelming majority of members believed to serve a good cause with good conscience as proof that the organization had no criminal character.

2. Individuals.

a. Julius Streicher.

(1) Calls Fritz Herrwerth, lorry-driver, & seuss. Cramer-Klettstr, presumably in the Concentration Camp at Mossburg on Isar, who has knowledge of the following facts: The witness can testify that I made it known, before the demonstration planned against the Jewish population on the night of 8/9th November 1938, that I did not wish to have anything to do with it. I considered the proposed action, particularly the burning of synagogues, as misguided, because the world press would thus merely be given an opportunity of taking up an unfavorable attitude towards Germany. Herrwerth also knows that I grew very heated on the subject whenever the events of that time came up in conversation and that I strongly disapproved of the action taken then. Herrwerth was always in my company throughout a long period of time and can give information as to my whole attitude to the settling of the Jewish question, particularly on the fact that I have always been opposed to taking violent measures. These facts are relevant to the defense for the following reasons: It is precisely the events of the night of 8/9th November which appear to be particularly important for the passing of judgment on the defendant Streicher. The defendant Streicher vouches for the fact that he was strongly opposed to the use of any violence when boycott measures were taken on 1.4.33 and also on the occasion of the demonstration on November 9, 1935 and that he disapproved of the burning of synagogues.

(2) Book "Jewish Confessions," Sturmer Publishing House, Nuremberg, requested to prove that leading Jews admit in their writings that the Jews were aiming at a Jewish World domination and to wage war. Facts relevant as proof that anti-semitic propaganda work was to warn the people and protect them from enslavement by world Jewry.

(3) Book by "The Jew Kaufmann," which appeared in America in which he demands sterilization of all virile German males as the solution to the German question. If such a radical demand is not prosecuted as inciting public opinion in America, then the contents of the "Sturmer" cannot be considered as incitement.

(4) Treasurer Koellrich, Nuremberg, probably in concentration camp, requested for knowledge of following facts: Through him Streicher can prove that he did not participate in forcible transfer of Jewish real estate to Gentile ownership which took place toward the end of 1938 or the beginning of 1939; that "forcible transfers to Gentile ownership" were undertaken without his knowledge by Deputy Gau Leader Holz and he refused to shield Holz before the Fuhrer afterwards, thus drawing his enmity upon Streicher.

(5) Frau Adele Streicher, Nuerth i. B. Daniel Leystr. 4, requested for knowledge of following: During residence in Pleikershof took no part in any activity and confined himself to publication of the "Sturmer". With exception of two visits in 1944, received no political correspondence and no longer stood in relationship with Hitler. Witness can further confirm disapproval of events of November 1938, especially the acts of violence against the Jews. Witness also present when Engineer Vogt, on an opportune visit, mentioned an offer made in 1934 of payment of a sum of money and the gift of a villa in Switzerland if he stopped writing in the "Sturmer."

(6) Otto Kriminalrat, Nuremberg, likely to be in a concentration camp, requested for knowledge of the following: This witness should testify that defendant took about 20 to 30 former members of the Communist party of Germany (KPD) and of the Social Democratic the role which the defendant is supposed to have played in the alleged conspiracy.

(6) Director General Dr. Malzacher, Armament Plenipotentiary, Salzburg. Is presumably in Austria. If he is at liberty, his address should be known to the economic service offices (Wirtschaftsdienststellen) of the Austrian Government, since he is a prominent industrialist. Requested for knowledge of following facts: Participant in a conference under the chairmanship of Speer around October, 1944, in which the non-destruction of the Polish-Upper Silesian industries was resolved on, and participant in various conferences between February and March, 1945, in which non-destruction of the Czechoslovak, Hungarian and Austrian industries was resolved on. Malzacher was my deputy. To prove: That the defendant saw to it that, despite orders existing against it at the time, no destruction was undertaken and bound this armament plenipotentiary, Malzacher, who represented him in these countries, to the observance of his commands in various detailed directives.

(7) Lt. Colonel von Poser, Officer attached to defendant in Glucksburg near Flensburg, Prov. of Schleswig, was made a prisoner here on 25 March 1945. Requested for knowledge of following facts: The witness accompanied defendant since the middle of 1944 on almost every trip. He is familiar with the steps taken to prevent Hitler's orders of September 1944 and March 1945 from being carried out and his knowledge of other "illegal" acts of the defendant. These facts are relevant to prove: This preventive action applied equally to orders also in Luxemburg, Alsace, Lorraine, Czechoslovakia, large parts of Poland and Austria. Defendant's authority was actually limited to "Greater Germany".

(8) Requests document "Confidential Circular to Plant Managers concerning treatment of Prisoners of War." Last known location of document: Camp Dustbin, F.I.A.T., Hq., USFPM (Main). Secretaries, Miss Kempf or Miss Magiera know the document. It was at Dustbin as late as 25 Sep 1945. Document will prove: Recommendation of additional favors to be accorded Prisoners of War in order to enhance their performances; signed by defendant in Mar (?) 1944. Facts are relevant because: They prove that the efforts of the defendant went counter to Goering's endeavors at that time to put the SS in charge of the Prisoners of War in order to enhance their performance.

(1) Requests Mrs. Maria Hoepken, now at Urfeld on Walchensee (Upper Bavaria (domiciled with Schirach). She was for many years Secretary of the defendant von Schirach and should confirm:

a. That the defendant von Schirach had nothing at all to do with the expulsion of Jews from Vienna. Rather that the expulsion of the Jews from Vienna was the result of a direct order of Hitler and carried out by the SS in Vienna on the instructions of SS-Obergruppenführer Heydrich in Berlin, without Schirach, as Gauleiter of Vienna, having had to cooperate in any way.

b. That during the carrying out of the transportation of Jews from Vienna, it was only known that the Vienna Jews would be settled somewhere in the East of Europe, but at that time it was not known to the defendant Schirach that the Vienna Jews were to be exterminated.

c. The witness Maria Hoepken will testify further that the defendant von Schirach had nothing to do with the carrying out of the transportation of Jews from Vienna, further that he exercised a moderating influence on his colleagues with regard to the Jewish question, and urged them to use the greatest consideration in the execution of orders issued by Hitler against the Jews.

d. That the defendant von Schirach, during the whole period of his term of office in Vienna, successfully aimed at a pacification of the Gau within the sphere of church policy, and tried for the re-establishment and maintenance of a correct relationship with the church authorities.

(2) Karl Scharizer, formerly deputy Gau Leader in Vienna, now prisoner in American hands (presumably in a camp in Austria), regarding the following facts:

a. Scharizer was already under the former Gau Leader in Vienna, Buerckel, his deputy, and was also deputy of the defendant von Schirach during his entire term of office in Vienna as Gau Leader; he can confirm that:
(1) Schirach, in pronounced opposition to his predecessor Buerkel, during his whole time in Vienna, tried and succeeded in a pronounced policy of pacification in relation to the Christian Churches and that Schirach exercised his influence over his subordinates in the same sense.

(2) That Schirach, in connection with the treatment of Jews and half Jews, always advised moderation to his subordinate sub-leaders and officers of the Party.

(3) That the Chancellery of the Party did not trust the defendant von Schirach, as according to their point of view, he was not sufficiently radical and did not follow the directives of the Reich Leader Borman in church and Jewish questions.

(3) Franz Stuppaseck, former Consultant on General Culture of the Reichstatthalter in Vienna (now possibly in the concentration camp of Ludwigsburg near Stuttgart). He knows above all that:

a. The defendant von Schirach stood in pronounced opposition to Hitler and Goebbels in respect of political culture, and therefore was mistrusted more and more by Hitler, especially as Schirach stood for the retention of Jewish and half Jewish artists in Viennese Cultural Institutes, and was therefore exposed to sharp attacks by Party circles.

(4) Heinz Schmidt, former Hauptmannfuehrer and head of the Foreign Department of the Reich Youth Movement (formerly in Berlin, now presumably in an American Concentration Camp.)

a. As a former collaborator, he knows his views exactly, and knows that Schirach always aimed at a peaceful agreement between the German Youth Movement and the youth of other countries; moreover, that Schirach had absolutely no military tendencies, and in particular had no intention of building up the youth movement for warlike purposes, especially for those of a war of aggression.
(5) Gunter Kaufmann, Principal Editor, formerly in Vienna (now probably in an American Concentration Camp).

(a) He was for a long time Press Consultant under Schirach in Vienna, and knows that Schirach was often in opposition to Hitler and Goebbels as to his political views, and especially his views on foreign policy. Further, that Schirach, in the cultural domain, always aimed at an agreement with other nations, (e.g. France, etc.) and that Schirach never gave any instructions for a "psychological preparation for war", but on the contrary always advocated the policy that war must be avoided under all circumstances.

d. Dr. A. Seyss-Inquart.

(1) Requests document: Welcoming article of the present Chief of the Government Dr. K. Renner about The Union, published in March or April 1938 in the Neuen Wiener Tageblatt or another Viennese paper. The document will prove: That the published article is to prove that the present Chief of the Government of Austria, Dr. Renner, a permanent opponent of Nationalism, accepted the realization of the Union-idea (Anschlussidee) and then approved it after accomplishment as meeting the will of the majority. These facts are relevant to prove: The accomplishment of the Union met the will of the greater part of the Austrian population.

(2) Requests Ward Price, Correspondent for the "Daily Mail, London, who has knowledge of the following facts:

a. The attitude and behaviour of the Austrian people towards the entering German troops and during the plebiscite period up to April 10.

b. Hitler told the witness on March 13, that he had already made up his mind 4 days ago (Schuschnigg's speech in Innsbruck on the plebiscite) to resolve the Austrian question and effect the union.

c. These facts are relevant to prove: the part played by and the importance of the actions of the defendant in the carrying out of the Anschluss.

(3) Requests document: Pastoral letter of the Austrian episcopate of April 1938, signed by Cardinal Dr. Innitzer, Vienna, Archiepiscopal Ordinate in Vienna.
d. Dr. A. Seyss-Inquart (Cont'd).

Document requested to prove: That the Catholic church, the religion of the greater part of the Austrian population, recommended to their followers to vote in favor of the Union (Anschluss). These facts are relevant to prove: That the Catholic church would not have given this advice to their followers, if the church was not of the opinion that the Union would have met the will of the majority of the Austrian people:

(4) Requests document: Film of Hitler's entry into Linz, probably at the former Reich Film Department. Document will be used to prove: The enthusiasm with which the Union (Anschluss was received in Hitler's homeland, Upper-Austria. These facts are relevant to prove: That the assertion of the accused that the population of Austria favored the Union ("Anschluss") is correct.

(5) Requests Dr. Guido Schmid, Former Austrian Foreign Minister, last in Vienna(?), who has knowledge of the following facts:

a. Has been currently oriented about my political intention and plans.

b. Report about my visit with F. u. R.K. on 17th February 1938 as represented in the document.

c. Conference with B. K. Schuschnigg in the evening of the 10th, attempting to find a way out.

d. Conversation on the 11th March 1938 about 1700 - Schmid told me: All of us are of the conviction that the Reich wants to finish with Austria. It is best if you accept the chancellorship so that the whole thing will be halfway tolerable.

e. These facts are relevant to prove: My political plan was: The National Socialists should receive permission to take an active part and share responsibility in the State, but this on account of an express declaration by Hitler as a Party Leader to stand upon the basis of the Austrian constitution and should be completely independent from the Reich or the Reich Party. Those were also my demands from Hitler on the 17th February. Therefore, the reproach of my participation in the conspiracy against Austrian independence becomes nullified. From the word of Schmid (d) we can gather that in informed circles of Austria nobody was expecting from me resistance against the Reich. Further, that around that time the matter was fundamentally already decided and further incidents were only coincidental matters.
Dr. A. Seyss-Inquart (Cont'd).

(6) Requests document: Memorandum on my conversation with the Fuehrer; last known location: Vienna or Delden in the Netherlands. The memorandum was in a portfolio, which was inscribed "Secret Files." It was either in Vienna in my Liaison Department in the Consular Academy or in my staff office in the Netherlands, lost in Delden.

Document will be used to prove: On the contents of my talk with the Fuehrer on the 17.11.38. These facts are relevant to prove: In this conversation I asked that the Austrian National Socialists remain entirely independent from the Reich and must act in accordance with the Austrian constitution. Whoever, in spite of this, acted in an illegal way would be locked up by me in my capacity as Minister for Security. And so, what I asked was the exact opposite of what might have been the substance of a Nazi conspiracy. And this happened on 17.11.38.

(7) Prof. Dr. Hantsch, University of Vienna; last known location, Vienna or Graz. Requested for knowledge of following: The witness, as a historian of the country affected by the Anschluss, is to give an exact description of the Anschlussbewegung from 1918 to 1945. These facts are relevant to prove: From the description by the above named witness, will result that the defendant's way of thinking and acting regarding the question of a Union, especially coincides in the most important phases 1918 to 1945 with the overwhelming majority of the Austrian people.

(8) Former Ambassador Freiherr v. Weizaecker, last address Rome, who has knowledge of following facts: The accused has talked with the witness at several occasions before September 1st 1939; in those discussion, the accused and the witness expressed the fear that the policies taken might lead to war. These facts are relevant to prove: That the accused did not know the aims of the conspiracy and consequently cannot be a conspirator himself.

(9) Minister Lemmers, at present in Nurnberg under arrest, who has knowledge of the following: The German police did not come under the authority of the accused, in his capacity as Reich-Commissioner for the Netherlands, but they carried out their own duties under the direct authority of the Chief of the German Police, Himmler.

Sphere of duty of the German police in the Netherlands; and the accused had an interview with the witness at the end of August 1939, in the course of which they both expressed their fears, that there might be a war. These facts are relevant to prove: That the Reich-Commissioner did not have the right to interfere or influence German police-matters. That the accused did not know the aims of a conspiracy; he can, therefore, not have been a conspirator.

(10) Dr. Schoengarth, Commandant of the Security Police (Sicherheitspolizei; last known location, The Hague (Holland).

a. Requested for knowledge of following facts:

   (1) No shooting of hostages took place in the Netherlands with the exception of one case, which was ordered by the Armed Forces.

   (2) The defendant checked the roster of Dutch Clergymen then in Germany proper (im Reich befindliche niederlandische Geistliche) and demanded that one-third be released immediately and an additional third in three to six months. This request was acceded to.

   (3) The Jewish population in Westerbork Camp was well fed.

   (4) The defendant prevented the shipment of the equipment of the Leuwarden electricity plant and ordered the witness to send the SS-leader charged with taking care of the shipping across the border into Germany.

   (5) The defendant has taken strong steps, including criminal proceedings and warrants, against looting in evacuated territories.

   (6) These facts are relevant to prove: That defendant has done everything to prevent violations of the rules of international law.

(11) Ambassador (Gesandter) Bene, last known location: The Hague.

a. Requested for knowledge of following facts:
d. Dr. A. Seyss-Inquart (Cont'd).

(1) After the high rate of mortality at Buchenwald became known, defendant successfully insisted upon the return of 600-800 Dutchmen from there to the Netherlands.

(2) Defendant who only heard of the transfer of 400 Jews to Mauthausen after it had been accomplished, protested against such deportations.

(3) In spite of the fact that the Dutch Red Cross supported illegal activity, defendant did not take any measures against it.

(4) Defendant supported foreign Red Cross projects to aid the Netherlands in a most liberal manner.

(5) Defendant prevented the execution of the dynamiting of all technical installations, including dykes and flood-gates. He stated that he wished to terminate the occupation of the Netherlands in a decent manner.

(6) These facts are relevant to prove: That defendant is not guilty of violations of the provisions of international law.

(12) Dr. Friedrish Wimmer, last known location: The Hague.

a. Requested for knowledge of following facts:

(1) The administration of the Netherlands was carried out in the closest possible agreement with the Dutch authorities, particularly changes in personnel were undertaken only with the utmost care.

(2) The accused returned the Dutchmen, who had been sentenced to prison and who had been deported to the labour camp Rees near Koeln, to Holland on the protest of the Dutch Judges.

(3) The accused intervened with Hitler and Himmler against the order, that Dutchmen, who had acted against the security of the Reich, should be shot without trial.

(4) The accused, who was informed of the fact only after the deportation of 400 Jews to Mauthausen, had been carried out, protested against such deportations.

(5) The shooting of 50 hostages ordered by the High Command of the Army was reduced to 5 by the intervention of the accused; the accused could not prevent the shooting, because the order was issued to the Police by the Armed Forces.

(6) These facts are relevant to prove: That the accused did everything to avoid offenses against the provisions of International Law.

(13) Former General Field Marshall v Brauchitsch, address unknown, who has knowledge of the following: In May 1940 the defendant had a conference with the witness during which he presented to him his plans with reference to the Jewish question in the Netherlands. The defendant told the witness that he wanted to expel the Jews from public administration and from leading positions in the economy, but that he did not have intentions of going further. These facts are relevant as evidence that the sharp measures against the Jewish population of the Netherlands can not be attributed to the initiative of the defendant.

(14) General of the Cavalry von Kleffel, last known location: The Netherlands, who has knowledge of following facts: The accused has personally applied to Hitler, in cooperation with the witness who was Supreme Commander at that time; he has told Hitler about the possibilities to defend Holland and has especially emphasized the possibility of the destruction of the country and the impossibility of a defense, with a starving population. The accused inquired, if it would not be better to evacuate Holland and to incorporate the troops and the material into the defense front of the Reich. The accused received no reply to his letter which was directed to Hitler. These facts are relevant as proof that the accused has tried everything to prevent violations against the provisions of International Law.

(15) Reich-Judge Dr. Ernst Schwebel, former deputy for Southern Holland; last known location, The Hague, who has knowledge of the following facts:

a. The action leading to the deportation of all the men in the province of Holland, able to bear arms, to the Reich was a matter of the Armed Forces, on which the accused had no influence.
b. The accused prevented further harbour-demolitions through the Armed Forces.

c. The accused was able to have a large part of the issued evacuation order cancelled by direct intervention with the supreme commander.

The document requested will be used to prove opposition against Hitler and Goering and to show that he did not participate in a Conspiracy.

(4) General Field Marshal Rundstedt, in U.S. Prison, has knowledge that the defendant tried to instigate the Generals to resist to the mistreatment of Fritsch in Spring 1938. (8) Regierungspräsidient Dr. Diehls, Nurnberg, Novalisstr. 24, can furnish information on Schacht's personality, his fundamental attitude, and his repudiation of Hitler. Dr. Diehls', on the basis of his former known official position is more thoroughly acquainted than almost anyone else with the actual sociological backgrounds of the German people and of the ruling class and is therefore able to make especially substantial and reliable depositions concerning Schacht's ever increasing opposition to the regime and, in particular, to Hitler's personal rule. His knowledge derives from direct observation of the happenings in this connection.

Extracts from his statement follow: ---- "As I was at that time already out or at least evaded by many people who feared to publicly show their sympathy or even acquaintance with me on account of my purely Jewish ancestry and had among other things been forced to resign my position as one of the Presidents of the International Chamber of Commerce, I was particularly struck when Schacht told me that he hoped I would call at his office whenever I wished because he wanted to keep contact with me. In the years '33 to '37 I called on Schacht fairly often (I cannot say how many times). He always had time for me, was always very outspoken, obliging and helpful as far as he could. Not only as a general impression but from what he actually said in our conversations I never had any doubt that Schacht was growing more skeptical and critical about Hitler's policy in many ways as time went on. He criticized inter alia Hitler's anti-semitic agitation and their consequences not only in his conversations with me but also in a public speech (I believe in Königsberg). When the Nazi censorship prevented the press from publishing this speech, he had it privately printed and distributed it by post. I also received a copy."
c. Dr. Hjalmar Schacht (Cont'd)

"In the year 1937 he sent word to me to Frankfurt that he wanted to see me. When I came to his office a day or two later he told me that he had asked me to come because contrary to his hopes, the situation had developed in such a way that he was unable to take the responsibility any longer (I cannot swear that he used these words, but that was the meaning); he continued verbally: 'I am going to lay my head on the block and it will roll.' I answered that it would be a very serious matter for Germany and incidentally for me and asked him what he advised me to do. His answer was, 'Don't bother, stick to your guns, you will get through all right. This whole set-up is sure to break down' (again I cannot swear that he used these very words, but whatever words he used that was clearly their meaning)."

"The above are only some of the salient points which stuck to my memory but I remember a number of other facts about my dealings and contacts with Schacht when his views and actions stood in critical opposition to the Nazi Government's, about which I could also give a detailed account."

reference to this book. In document is cited only following "The Jewish question will be solved for Europe only when the last Jew has left the European continent". Defendant Rosen-

Jewish Problem.
(4) Riel, Ministerialrat, in charge of social and labor politics in the Ministry for the East Flensburg (in May). Riel had last worked in Flensburg for the former Minister Salzbe. Defendant wishes witness to show efforts to improve the lot of workers from the East.

(5) First Directive addressed to Reich Commissioner Koch (autumn 1941). In defendant's "East" files. Wishes to show that he directed, among other things, personally correct behavior and just treatment of the population. Relevant to show attitude of the Ministry of Eastern affairs (Ostministerium).

(6) Instruction of December 14, 1943 addressed to Reich Commissioner Koch. Photostatic copy of it was submitted to defendant in the preliminaries. (10) Defendant requests: Decree of Minister for Eastern Affairs (Ostminister) dated 14 December 1945, to the Reich Commissary for the Ukraine, concerning equitable treatment, etc. Location unknown. The decree was produced to defendant Rosenberg in course of an interrogation. He wishes this to show that he did what he could to insure an equitable administration and refute contention that he acted against principles of humanity.
(11) Document, "Der Zukunftsweg einer deutschen Aussenpolitik" ("The Future Orientation of Germany's Foreign Policy"). Out of print, but obtainable from Bavarian National Library, Munich; or University Library, Munich; or former Central Publications Dept of NSDAP, Munich, Thierstrasse 11. Work contains, in a rather long passage, an article from "Vossische Zeitung", in which the Jewish journalist G. Bernhard offered German colonial slaves for the French colonies. Georg Bernhard was editor of democratic "Vossische Zeitung" and Chairman of the Reich Association of the German press. The demand for deportations of that nature is therefore no National Socialist invention.

(12) Manuscript letter from Rosenberg to the Fuehrer on the question of Rosenberg's dismissal from the editorship of the Voelkischer Beobachter. In the impounded steel box belonging to Rosenberg, where his other documents are contained. Wished as proof of Rosenberg's political disinterestedness and that he cannot be described as a conspirator.

Wishes to show that his possibilities to influence the territorial administration were limited.

h. Joachim von Ribbentrop

(1) Lord Beaverbrook. To prove that von Ribbentrop in the year 1936-37 was invited by the witness to visit in Berlin, in order to converse with him about German-English relations, and that von Ribbentrop, on the occasion of this visit, conveyed Hitler’s strong desire and his own desire for a friendly shaping up of relations between Germany and England.

(2) Lord Kemsley. To prove that von Ribbentrop during his stay as ambassador in London in repeated talks and conversations with the witness expressed his and Hitler's strong desire to shape up German-England relations in a friendly fashion and if possible, to develop them into an alliance, and von Ribbentrop tried to convince the witness of the necessity of such friendly relations because, in this way, the stability of the world and the future of both countries would be best guaranteed.
(3) Lord Londonderry. To prove that von Ribbentrop's endeavors for friendly relations between Germany and Britain, and subsequently the witness endeavoured to obtain from influential English politicians and statesmen an understanding of Germany's interests on the part of England, but that he for the most part found a negative attitude.

(4) Lord Vansittart. To prove that von Ribbentrop very often had political conversations with the witness in the years 1936–8, especially on the occasion of the German–English naval agreement and a visit to the Olympic Games in Berlin 1936; and that von Ribbentrop conveyed to the witness Hitler's urgent desire and his own desire to shape up relations between Germany and England in a friendly fashion; and that von Ribbentrop on this occasion tried to convince the witness, whose great influence on English policy he knew, of the necessity of developing these friendly relations into an alliance between Germany and England.

(5) To prove that von Ribbentrop tried, from 1939 onwards, to achieve friendly relations between Germany and Great Britain with a view to bringing about an alliance between the two States. He worked conscientiously and earnestly to this end, although his efforts came to nothing, and the following witnesses can testify, from conversations they had with von Ribbentrop, as to his attitude:

(7) Defendant requests White Books of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for the years 1938-1944. Can be obtained from the "Protectorates" (Schutzstaten) or from large libraries. Document gives historical sequence of the diplomatic activities of the Ministry of Foreign affairs in the tension-years 1938-1944. Especially for the exchange of notes, public speeches of important persons of the Reichs Government and Party. Relevant to show negation of accusation according to which defendant supported preparations for war, participated in planning, preparation of wars in violation of international treaties, executed foreign policy plans or taken the responsibility for their execution.

(8) Miss Wolff, Secretary of Adolf Hitler. (Reichs Chancellery, Berlin). Has knowledge that the Fuhrer did not give defendant insight into public speeches, contemplated by him, before he delivered them. Negation of the accusation that he was consulted in foreign policy matters of the most important significance by the Fuhrer in advance about his resolutions and intentions.

i. Dr. h.c. Erich Raeder.

(1) Otto Schultze, Generaladmiral. Went into retirement in 1937, reentered the Wehrmacht 1 March 1941, and was active as commanding admiral in France until August 1942. Can testify defendant urged Hitler repeatedly that peace should be made with France, although Hitler did not want to. In order to expedite the matter on the part of the navy, I left for Paris in February 1942 for a conference with Darlan which was successful.
Can also show that defendant handed in his resignation repeatedly, first in 1937-38, until it was finally accepted in 1943. Defendant wishes to show he did not want conquests and that he carried out military measures only when they were strategic necessities and when there were no ethical objections.

(2) Conrad Albrecht, Generaladmiral, Hamburg-Altona. From 1932-1938, Commanding Admiral in Kiel, Naval Base, Baltic Sea Group Commander East; 1 November, 1939, went into retirement. The witness as a close colleague of many years, knows that neither the navy nor defendant as commander in chief wanted war, especially a war of aggression, and that I believed as late as in the summer of 1939 that there would be no war, in virtue of Hitler's statements. The witness knows, moreover, that defendant warned Hitler very often. The navy prepared itself for a defensive war alone, as all war games and maneuvers of navy showed, in particular, as late a maneuver as that in the spring of 1939. Witness also to show defendant's Christian attitude toward the church, the support of the church within the navy, far from any National Socialist convictions. To show that conferences with Hitler concerned only technical matters pertaining to the fleet, not political matters. To show that in daily routine in the High Command; Documents which were not initiated by defendant were not submitted to me either. Facts relevant to defense to refute indictment, according to which he took part in a plan and conspiracy to wage wars of attack and in other war crimes.

(3) Schreiber, Commander (Fregattenkapitaen) Berlin-Dahlem, Im Döl 63. Witness was from 1939 to 9 April 1940 Naval Attache in Oslo, Norway, and after the occupation First Adjutant to the Admiral in Command in Norway; later he was in the Naval war administration (Sekringsleitung). Witness has knowledge that on the German side there was the conviction, based on well-founded intelligence, that the Allied forces were planning the occupation of bases in Norway; that the Naval High Command (OKU) had nothing whatever to do with the administration of Norway, nor with the war crimes in Norway mentioned in the indictment; that the defendant endeavored again and again to persuade Hitler to set up in the interest of Norway, a military administration under Admiral Bohm in place of the civilian administration under Terboven. Wishes to refute charges of war crimes against Norway.

(4) Erich Schulte-Moenting, Rear Admiral (Viceadmiral) Norway (Drontbo)
Witness was adjutant to defendant, later was the chief of staff; after defendant's departure, he was admiral in command on the Norwegian West coast in Trondheim, there he was taken prisoner, and is probably in a prisoner-of-war camp in England (Scotland). As adjutant, or as chief of staff, witness is oriented on basic principles as well as on actual performance of defendant and can testify especially that:

a. Naval strength was built up with a merely defensive objective.

b. That all war games and maneuvers had always as basis a theoretically assumed defensive war only, never a war of aggression.

c. That defendant never wanted a war of aggression and never took part in any planning for a war of aggression.

d. That the occupation of Norway was carried out for strategic reasons only, because the occupation of bases in Norway by the Allies was imminent.

Witness also has knowledge of order of business in the Naval administration (Seekriegsleitung): Papers, that were neither signed nor initialed by defendant, were not brought to his attention and remained unknown to him.

The memorandum of Frick was without military significance and without command. Witness can also testify on defendant's church and political attitude; also differences with Himmler and Heydrich and the correspondence resulting from this between Himmler and defendant because of Heydrich, who attacked defendant many times. Wishes to refute points one and two of the indictment.

(5) Gerhard Wagner, Commodore (Konteradmiral) Nurnberg Prison.
Chief of Operations Section within the leadership of naval war (Seekriegsleitung). Witness has knowledge of facts for the refutation of the indictment, according to which defendant took part in a conspiracy for the waging of wars of aggression or in other war crimes.

The witness was chief of the Naval Fiscal Division. Defendant wishes to refute point 1 of the indictment. Witness is acquainted with the extent of the violations of the Versailles Treaty, and knows in this connection that the extent was very limited and was designed only for a possible defensive war, not for a possible war of aggression.
Witness can testify: that fewer ships were built than was allowed in the Versailles Treaty; that the Naval Agreement of 1935 proves that no war of aggression was planned and that the Naval Agreement was adhered to; that if the armored ships when finished had a greater water displacement than originally planned, this was based exclusively on defense and protection considerations, that is, in order to make the ships involved as unsinkable as possible; the possible violation was only a defensive, not an offensive matter; that fewer ships were built than the Naval Agreement allowed for and that the Navy and the defendant had no idea that an attack by Japan on Pearl Harbor was planned -- they learned this only after the attack had been carried out.

(7) Hugo Lackorn, Merchant, Head Clerk of the firm, Theodor Thorer, Leipzig, Bruehl 68. Can be reached at any time at the firm Theodor Thorer, Leipzig, Bruehl 68. Witness has knowledge that prior to the occupation of Norway the witness was on business in Oslo, and learned there of the imminent landing of allied forces in Norway. To refute accusation against defendant that he suggested and planned a criminal war of attack against Norway, while he meant merely to counter the plans of the enemy's armed forces for reasons of strategy.

(3) White Book of Foreign Office about Norway, Foreign Office, Berlin. Copies were obtainable in all larger Libraries. Document to show that in 1939-40 a plan was conceived and prepared between England and France to occupy Norway, especially in Narvik. The plan should be executed by England. English troops were shipped in the beginning of April 1940. These facts to prove defendant considered it necessary to occupy Norway only from tactical grounds in order to frustrate the war measures of the opponent.

j. Franz von Papen

(1) Kurt Freiherr von Lersner, residing either at Niedererlenbad near Frankfurt on Main or in Istanbul (Turkey), was president of German Oriental Society (Deutschen Orient-Vereins) in Istanbul. Unknown if he has lately returned to Germany from Istanbul to his afore-mentioned address. Witness, from 1932 he was in constant close contact with the defendant von Papen, and that he was on occasions entrusted with special political missions by the latter, and because in his capacity as president of the German Oriental Society located in Istanbul he is able to pass judgment on the defendant's activity as ambassador in Turkey. He can prove that:

a. The defendant did everything in power as chancellor in 1932 to lead the Nazi movement from the opposition to responsible cooperation with his government, but that he refused to suggest to the Reich President that Hitler be placed at the head of a new government.

b. At the conversation of the defendant v. Papen with Hitler on 4 January 1933 at the house of the banker Schroeder, on the initiative of Hitler and in continuation of his (Papen's) efforts during the time of his Chancellorship, nothing was ever mentioned other than the incorporation of the Nazi Party into the Schleicher government, and that the establishment of a Hitler government (as it occurred on the 30 January) with the cooperation of the defendant von Papen was never mentioned.

c. In the time between 4 January 1933 and the day, on which Reich President von Hindenburg requested the defendant v. Papen to form a new government under the leadership of Hitler, no steps of any sort were taken on the part of the defendant von Papen - neither with the Reich President, nor with Hitler and his collaborators, nor with the Reich President, nor with Hitler and his collaborators, nor with the subsequent partners of the Hitler government - to prepare the development of such a government.

d. The Reich President von Hindenburg out of his own initiative gave the defendant von Papen the mission of forming a government with Hitler as the Reich Chancellor, after Schleicher's efforts to incorporate part of the Nazi party into the government for the purpose of forming a Reichstag majority had failed. The defendant pursued the aim to initiate with this new combination of conservative forces and the Nazi Party (now forced to accept responsibility) a renewal of the policy in the conservative spirit represented by von Hindenburg.
That for the above-mentioned purpose the defendant v. Papen suggested a combination of the bourgeois legal parties (Rechtsparteien) to a new party incorporating all conservative forces in the country, which could act as a possible strong counter-balance in the marriage with national-socialism.

This transformation and establishment of an internal counter-balance failed, because up to the Reichstag-election there was too little time for reorganization and presentation of newer, younger candidates.

Therefore the Defendant v. Papen decreed the establishment of a conservative election-block (Wahlblock) "black-white-red," for which he made a number of speeches in which he announced the program of "National Concentration".

The defendant v. Papen, through the impregnation of conservative ideas, continued to hope to change Hitler's policy to his own way of thinking, until the ensuing murders on 30 June 1934 and Hitler's approval thereof had convinced him that his efforts and his hopes had been in vain.

That the Defendant v. Papen, did attempt to come to terms with the French Government in respect to an immediate agreement to regulate the Saar problem without a plebiscite, in order that the agitation which had to be expected during a plebiscite would not spoil the relations between Germany and France.

That the defendant v. Papen, did attempt to come to terms with the French Government in respect to an immediate agreement to regulate the Saar problem without a plebiscite, in order that the agitation which had to be expected during a plebiscite would not spoil the relations between Germany and France.

The defendant v. Papen only accepted the assignment as Ambassador to Turkey, which he had twice refused in 1938, being impressed by the Italian advance in Albania, because he hoped to contribute something decisive for the maintenance of world peace.
In May 1939, he attempted to persuade the Italian Foreign Minister Ciano to revise the Italian intention in Albania, in order to remove thereby the tension in south-eastern Europe.

In May 1939 he presented a memorandum to the Foreign Office, Hitler, and the highest military offices, pointing out that any war which Germany, for any reason, felt herself justified to carry on, from the very beginning would have to be considered as lost, because Turkey had annexed herself to the coalition of the opponents, thereby making England’s position in the Near East unassailable.

The defendant v. Papen, in the fall of 1933, personally expressed himself sharply before the Cabinet and Hitler, concerning the withdrawal from the League of Nations, that he in fact followed Hitler to Munich, in order to persuade him to give up this intention.

That the defendant v. Papen, in spite of definite orders from Berlin to avoid any peace talk, sought close contact with the U.S. Naval Attache, Earls, at Istanbul, formerly USA Minister at Sofia and regarded as a confidant of President Roosevelt, in order to ascertain if and under which conditions Germany could obtain peace.

That the defendant v. Papen, during his assignment in Turkey, was continually in conflict with the NSDAP, so that he finally forbade Landesleiter of the Party, Friede, entry into the German Embassy, and forbade the officials of the Embassy all association with Friede, because this Landesleiter had remarked, "The Ambassador v. Papen should have been shot long ago, or at least should have been in a concentration camp." This remark by Friede was the result of the Ambassador’s energetic standpoint, who had forbidden all subversive activity in the Party. The Reich Foreign Office, upon the request of the Gauleiter Bohls (Foreign Organization) attempted to get the Ambassador to at once withdraw his orders against Friede, and that the defendant v. Papen replied that he would request his departure, in so far as the Reich Foreign Office insisted upon these demands. The Ambassador only after a year’s tough fight against the Party succeeded in having the Landesleiter Friede recalled.
Dr. Visser, Royal Dutch Minister in Ankara.

To prove that:

a. von Papen in conversations with the witness between the 1.9.1939 and the 10.5.1940 often expressed the fact that he was trying with all the means at his disposal to end the war, or in any case prevent an expansion of it.

b. That the witness thereupon disclosed to the defendant von Papen in November 1939 that he saw a possibility to initiate, through the Royal Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs, a conversation with Downing Street, if the German Government had any acceptable peace proposals to make.

c. That the defendant von Papen at once took up this suggestion with the greatest willingness and that the witness and he frankly discussed the outlines and conditions of such an action, and that the defendant von Papen consequently told the witness he had submitted the plan to the Reich Foreign Minister and now was awaiting instructions approving this plan.

d. Since the treatment of this matter by letter apparently made insufficient progress, the defendant von Papen decided to fly to Berlin in December. The witness had authorized him to declare in Berlin that he, the witness, eventually would come to Berlin himself, in order to begin there the conversations with London via the Royal Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs.

e. That the defendant von Papen returned from his trip to Berlin depressed and disappointed because, in spite of all his efforts, his proposals had been turned down by the foreign minister as well as by Hitler.

f. That von Papen in his opposition to any aggressive policy of the Reich on 10.5.1940, in a letter to the witness, expressed his open disapproval of the violation of Dutch neutrality and the German-Dutch pact of non-aggression.

Minister Hans Kroll, until 1944 Botschaftsrat (embassy counselor). Not known whether witness at present still resides in Barcelona or has returned to Germany.
Witness has knowledge of following: that the defendant, in the sense of Bismarck's policy, has always regarded a close, friendly relationship with Russia — despite opposite domestic opinions — as the most important basis for the German foreign policy; that he, consequently, had absolutely condemned the attack on Russia which took place as a complete surprise to him; that, even after the war against Russia had broken out, he did not try to influence Turkey to accept a policy hostile to Russia; that he rather avoided anything which could have made Turkey's position toward Russia more difficult; that this policy of the defendant is also to be explained as a result of the defendant's negative attitude toward any aggressive ideas or any extension of war, as is known to the witness from his collaboration with the defendant for many years; that the defendant, furthermore, always prevented most energetically any subversive activities of the NSDAP in Turkey, that the defendant, despite the pressure from the Party kept the witness in his position, though he was not a member of the Party and, therefore, had difficulties through the Party and the Foreign Office.

(4) Admiral von Horthy, Hungarian Reichsverweser, to prove that the defendant aspired only to an evolutionary solution of the German–Jewish question and declined any settlement by force; that he did not carry out proposals from the Reich Cabinet which were meant to induc Hungary, with the promise of territorial advantages, to participate in an attack on Czechoslovakia; also that he did not participate in the later German–Hungarian negotiations which led to the 'Anschluss' of Hungary to the Axis powers and to her entrance into the war.

(5) Jan Gawronski, Former Ambassador of the Polish Republic in Vienna. Stayed in Rome after 1938 with his wife's family, the Brassois, and he was later, at least as 1944, in Cairo. Witness is called as counter evidence to affidavit of ambassador George S. Messersmith -2385 E3-, Messersmith has pointed out, that von Papen has engaged in an expansion policy of Germany toward the Southeast. For that purpose, territorial promises have been made to the European powers interested, so also Poland, probably from the remainder of the Czechoslovakia Republic.

(6) Professor Marchionini, M.D., of the national Musterkran- konhaus in Ankara, to prove that:

a. von Papen demanded in speeches to the German colony in Ankara and Istanbul refutation of a war of conquest a rapid end of the war, if European culture was not to be destroyed.
b. The defendant von Papen refuted the persecution of Judaism, decided on through the Nurnberg laws and since then carried out as incompatible with the principles of the Roman church.

c. In a party court action, instigated by the NSDAP against members of his embassy (because these gentlemen had consulted a well known Jewish physician – Professor Dr. E. S. Stein – for the medical treatment of their children) took their part by declaring officially that he himself would have acted in the same manner.

d. Has refused to obey the orders of his superior authorities, when they ordered, that the passports were to be withdrawn from all German Jews, residing in Turkey, and that the latter were to be declared to have lost their German citizenship.

e. Rather has represented and accomplished with the Reich Cabinet (Reichsregierunge), that such "non-Aryan" citizens should not be robbed of their German citizenship, and that they should be left unmolested in their field of activity.

f. That the defendant von Papen in several cases, in which the Turkish government was requested by foreign governments (Rumanian, Bulgarian) to permit the transport of Jewish refugees from these countries via Turkey to Palestine, used his influence with success on the Turkish government that this permission was granted and that thus the misery of the refugees was alleviated greatly.

g. That the defendant von Papen has prevented the state headquarters of the NSDAP in Turkey from issuing directives for the boycott of Jewish businesses to the German citizens, living in Turkey.

(7) Archbishop Roncalli, Papal Delegate in Instanbul, to prove that:

a. The defendant von Papen, after the occupation of Greece by German troops, at the suggestion of the witness, caused the German Government to give its consent to the establishment of a Papal Delegation in Athens, a wish of the Vatican which had been unfulfilled for decades.
b. The defendant von Neurath actively resisted the intention of the Reich government to completely suppress schools maintained by religious orders, and, in particular, prevented the dissolution of the St. George School, which was maintained by the Laharists, with an attendance of about 200 pupils, contrary to the orders of the Reich government and financially supported this school.

k. Konstantin von Neurath.

(1) Former Ambassador, Kurt Prüfer, Geneva 1, rue Emile Jung. To prove that the defendant was opposed to the war-policy as desired and carried on by the party. Witness to show that the defendant entered Hitler's Government as Minister of Foreign Affairs only at special request of the then Reich President von Hindenburg, and that he did so only out of respect he felt for the Reich President; that Hindenburg saw in the Defendant a guarantee for the continuation of the unequivocal peace policy followed so far by Germany; that Hitler disagreed to the peace policy, represented and pursued by the defendant as Foreign Minister, a policy which aimed at the avoidance of wars or warlike conflicts; that the defendant resisted always the infiltration of National Socialist elements, especially the appointment of party members as employees of the Foreign Office.

(2) Hjalmar Schacht, to show that:

a. The turning over of ruling power to Hitler by Reich President von Hindenburg in January 1933 came about without the defendant von Neurath's being taken into consultation and without any participation on his part. He was taken over into Hitler's government as Foreign Minister upon the express desire of Reich President von Hindenburg who wanted to insure with this a continuation of the previous foreign policy.

b. At the time of Hitler's seizure of power there were no plans of any kind or resolutions of the Nazis about future foreign policy; above all there were also no resolutions or plans for wars of aggression to be waged or any acts of violence against other states, nor were they discussed or decided on up to the separation from the Reich Government of defendant von Neurath.

c. Until the defendant von Neurath left, the foreign policy of the Reich, sanctioned by Hitler and conducted by the defendant von Neurath, was an absolutely peaceful one. The defendant von Neurath has always protested against the transgressions and the laws against the Jews.

d. At the occasion of the awarding of the Golden Party Medal on the 20th of January 1937 to the defendant von Neurath and the other non-party members of the Reich Government, Hitler declared expressly that this decoration, namely the highest he could award, which, however, entailed no obligations of any kind towards the party. The defendant von Neurath, soon after the conference of the 5th of November 1937, protested against the plans and intentions stated by Hitler in this conference and turned in his position for resignation.

e. Defendant wishes to prove by above that he never knew anything about existence of a conspiracy directed towards the waging of wars of aggression or belonged to such a conspiracy, and also that he never participated in the planning or preparation of such a war of aggression.

(3) Dr. Stroelin, former Mayor of Stuttgart, prison of Nuremberg, to show that:

a. The defendant, conducting the German foreign policy, was far from having any intention of achieving any goal by means of war or generally by means of arms; that his entire policy was rather directed towards the preservation of the peace and towards bringing about better relations with the other powers; that he rejected any policy of aggression and force because he could not reconcile such policy with his convictions and always stressed this fact towards Hitler.

b. The defendant repeatedly made representations with Hitler - quite often successfully - on account of excesses against the church, its branches and monasteries by national-socialist functionaries.

c. The defendant most emphatically condemned crimes against humanity as far as he learned of them, that he protested against them and intervened as much as it was within his power.

d. That the defendant did not agree by any means with the foreign policy of Hitler and the NSDAP; and that if he, in spite of that fact, remained in office as Reich Minister for Foreign Affairs until the end of 1937 and later assumed the office of Reich Protector of Bohemia and Moravia—only did so by reason of a sense of responsibility and duty toward the German people, with the desire and the hope to prevent worse acts and to influence Hitler to refrain from harmful decisions and acts.

e. Wishes to prove he always opposed a policy directed towards war and suppression of foreign people.

(4) Kurt Frueber, Ambassador and Chief of the Personnel Department of the Reich Foreign Ministry at present; Geneva rue Emile Jung.

Defendant wishes to show his opposition to war policy which the party wanted and followed.

(5) Wilhelm Frick, Remand Prison Nurnberg. Can testify:

a. The turning over of ruling power to Hitler by Reich President von Hindenberg in January 1933 came about without the defendant von Neurath being taken into consultation and without any participation on his part. He was taken over into Hitler's government as Foreign Minister upon the express desire of Reich President von Hindenburg who wanted to insure this a continuation of the previous foreign policy.

b. At the time of Hitler's seizure of power there was no plan of any kind or resolutions of the Nazis about future foreign policy; above all, there were no resolutions or plans for wars of aggression to be waged or any acts of violence against other states; nor were they discussed or decided on up to the separation from Reich Government of the defendant von Neurath.

d. After his separation from the Reich Ministry, the defendant von Neurath, as inactive Minister of the Reich, was not a member of the Reich Government. He also took no longer part in any session of any discussion of the Reich Cabinet.

e. The secret Cabinet Council did not belong to the Reich Government. Its members as such were not admitted to, nor had they a seat or vote in, the Cabinet of the Reich. The Secret Cabinet Council never functioned, it never held a session.

f. At the occasion of the awarding of the Golden Party Medal on 20th of January 1937 to the defendant von Neurath and the other non-party members of the Reich Government, Hitler declared expressly that this decoration, namely the highest that he could award, entailed, however no obligations of any kind towards the party.

g. Wishes by the above to prove that the defendant participated neither in the seizure of power by Hitler nor in his own entrance in Hitler's Government. That until his retirement as Reich Minister he knew nothing of the existence of a conspiracy for a war of aggression directed against other states, nor did he know of the planning of such a war, or who belonged to such a conspiracy or participated in the planning or preparation of a war of aggression, that the foreign policy of the Reich directed by him was of an altogether peaceful nature.

(6) Lord Halifax, British Ambassador in Washington, USA, in the course of his visit to Berlin, and to Hitler at Obersalzberg, witness strongly intimated, in his capacity of the then Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, to the defendant as well as to Hitler and to the co-defendant Hermann Goering, that the British Cabinet would have no objections to a union of Austria with the German Reich. While discussing the Austrian question he stated to the defendant that the British people would never understand its having to fight a war because two German peoples wanted to unite. Defendant wishes to prove that, as things then stood with regard to the Austrian question, he was absolutely entitled to count on the assent of the signatory powers, and for that reason did not believe that he had to consider the union of the two countries a violation of the Locarno Pact.
Dr. Guido Schmidt, Former Austrian Foreign Minister St. Anton Vorarlberg. Was arrested by the French Army and in Sept., 1945, was in County Hospital at Lincoln. Witness had knowledge that defendant was a whole-hearted opponent of the Anschluss of Austria to the Reich by means of military force, finally used by Hitler, as well as the Nazi propaganda in Austria. b. That the defendant was not even in Prague on the 16th Nov 1939, the day of the student demonstrations, and only returned to Prague on the 19th Nov 1939, and that the measures taken by the Security Police against the demonstrating students (shooting and arrests) took place without his knowledge and his will; that the defendant when he learned about this immediately started to work for the release of the arrested students and that after great efforts he finally succeeded. That the closing of the Czech Universities had been ordered by Hitler himself, without his knowledge, and was announced by K.H. Frank during the absence of the defendant.
That the defendant took no steps against the Catholic Church and clergy in the Protectorate, that he was on good terms and had social relations with the late Archbishop of Prague who died in 1941. That Synagogues have not been closed and that the anti-Jewish laws and regulations of the Reich have not been introduced in the Protectorate until very late.

of objects of art within or out of the Protectorate.

as Reichs Protector by Himmler, and his consequent refusal in

c. That the defendant, Keitel, was never Reich Minister. He merely held the rank of a Reich Minister in the same way as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Commander-in-Chief of the Navy. He, therefore, was not Reich Minister in reality, but was without portfolio. He never assisted at a consulting cabinet session. To prove that Wehrmacht still in 1938 found itself involved in the greatest internal conflicts, and was in no way prepared for war due to great lack of organization. a. Way in which defendant protected the Greeks against stricter Italian armistice terms.

b. That the plans for march into France and Belgium were drawn up only after Polish campaign.

Defendant believes above will characterize his personality and relieve him of blame of intention to attack France before her declaration of war.

(13) Colonel Soltmann, last on the staff of the Commander-in-Chief of Southwest (Italy). To prove that: Captured documents and commands which came into his hands in April 1940 during the English Brigade attempt of landing in Lillhammer, and interrogations of prisoners of this brigade showed that the Germans barely preceded the English in landing in Norway. Also that at the end of the campaign in the West in June of 1940 in France a huge collection of French documents were captured in a railroad train and among these documents there were some found which revealed the evidence that the French high command insisted that the expedition against Norway be hastened.
(14) Pamsel, General of mountain troops, last known chief of staff of Army Group Graziani. Presumably in PW camp for generals in north Italy (army Graziani was later on the Ligurian Coast). Can testify to anti-national socialist attitude before 1933. To help clear defendant of the charge that he helped the NSDAP to power.

(15) General of the Infantry von Fowmann to show that as late as January 1933, Group Leader, Major in the General Staff of the Army, Jodl, participate in an inner-political maneuver under the leadership of Colonel or General Ott, which had as its objective the use of the Reichswehr against an uprising of the KPD (Communist Party of Germany) and of the NSDAP (National Socialist German Labor Party); and that defendant did not make any remarks whatever in favor of the NSDAP, prior to 30 January 1933, which gave the impression he would further the seizure of power.

n. Ernst Kaltenbrunner

(1) Ohlendorf, prev Staatssekretär Asst Cabinet member, imprisoned in Nurnberg. Witness has knowledge that defendant was active in the Intelligence Service only while all executive powers in all police matters, especially those over concentration camps, remained with Himmler, Mueller and Nebe. Facts to show that defendant cannot be held responsible for crimes against humanity, especially for crimes committed in Concentration Camps.

(2) President Burckhardt of the I.R.K., Geneva. To show that in a meeting between him and defendant in March 1945, he expressed wishes regarding the exchange of civilian internees of various nationalities and Jews, and the supply of concentration camps with food products and that defendant promised relief and brought about such; also that all executive power concerning concentration camps was in the hands of Himmler, Mueller, Pohl and Nebe. Object, to lessen the reproaches that defendant was responsible for conditions in concentration camps and the accusation that he committed crimes against humanity.

(3) Warneck, American custody in Nurnberg. Witness has knowledge that on basis of special plenary powers delegated to defendant by Himmler, in Spring of 1945, defendant forbade any mistreatment or killing of inmates of Concentration Camp of Mauthausen and ordered that entire camp be surrendered to approaching enemy. To counter accusations of crimes against humanity.
(4) Hermann Goering, Secretary General of the International Red Cross, Geneva. Witness negotiated with defendant in March 1945 about concentration camps, medical care, etc. Knows that not defendant but Himmler, Mueller, Pohl exclusively were responsible and that defendant succeeded in complying with many wishes regarding humane treatment, concentration camps, extradition of prisoners, etc. Relevant to counter charges of crimes against humanity.

(5) Hermann Neubacher, Former Ambassador, arrested by Americans (Oberursel?). Knows that all executives concerning Concentration Camps, especially erection, management, and dismissal were in hands of Himmler, Mueller, Pohl and Nebe. Defendant was engaged only in Intelligence Service. Relevant because defendant was engaged only in Intelligence Service and had no responsibility for Gestapo and other offices which committed crimes against humanity.

(6) Raudaschl, Mine Supervisor in Alt-Aussee (Austria). Knows defendant prevented the already prepared blasting of salt mine in Alt-Aussee and thus saved inestimable values (paintings, sculptures, altar, etc.) which were stored there. Defendant states he thereby created an opportunity to preserve important cultural values and to return them to original owners.

Hermann Goering

(1) Birger Dahlerus, Civilian manager of factory Bolinder at Stockholm Bolindersplan. To show that:

a. In July and August 1939 at Soemke Hissen-Koog, Goering negotiated for creation of a friendly atmosphere after the disturbance which was created by the invasion of the Czech part of Czechoslovakia. Negotiation was made possible through the mediation of witness Dahlerus in agreement with Chamberlain. Negotiations seemed to have good prospects for success.

b. As the problem of Danzig was brought up at the end of August 1939, in order to try a peaceful solution, Goering took up direct connection with the English Minister of Foreign Affairs Halifax by passing the German Foreign Office.

c. After the English Ambassador was snubbed by Ribbentrop as he read to him the note of reply, Goering as he learned of that event immediately invited, par telephone, Henderson. Henderson followed the call. Between him and Goering was a discussion by which Goering made known to Henderson the meaning of the note. Hence, Goering asked again Henderson's help inducing the Poles to negotiate.
d. Goering was an opponent of the Foreign Minister v. Ribbentrop, he considered him unfit, because England and France rejected him. He demanded many times that the Fuehrer should dismiss v. Ribbentrop as Foreign Minister. Goering attributed great importance to establishing relations with England.

e. After the war against Poland as well as after the war against France, Goering made again attempts for a peaceful settlement and offered the Fuehrer his connection with foreign countries for the purpose of mediation.

Above facts relevant to defense as evidence that Goering was an opponent of a war of aggression and in favor of a peaceful settlement.

(3) Sir George Ogilvie Forbes, in 1939 Ambassador at English Embassy in Berlin. Foreign Office, London. Has information that defendant negotiated with English Government in August 1939 to try to prevent outbreak of war. Wishes to prove that he did not plan a war of aggression.

(4) Neville Henderson's "Failure of a Mission". Defense states that in this book Henderson describes Goering's endeavors to preserve the peace. Evidence that Goering was opposed to a war of aggression and strove for a peaceful understanding.

(5) Francois-Poncet, former French Ambassador in Berlin, at present in Paris. Witness knows that Goering successfully used his influence on the occasion of the Sudeten German question in the fall of 1938 in order to reach a peaceful settlement and conclusion of the Munich treaty. To refute charge that Goering wanted aggressive warfare.

(6) Book of Birger Dahlerus: Sista Foorsoeket, "London-Berlin, Sommaren 1939", published by P.A. Nordstedt & Soener, Stockholm 1945. Dahlerus describes in this book how the defendant Goering strove to avoid the outbreak of war with Poland. As evidence that Goering was opposed to war and seriously tried to maintain the peace.

(7) Sir Arthur Cadogan, Under Secretary of State in London. Has knowledge that;
a. In July and August 1939, Goering through the mediation of the Swede Dahlerus in Agreement with Chamberlain, conducted promising negotiations with three English Members of Parliament to create a peaceful atmosphere after the alienation caused by the march into Czechoslovakia.

b. When the Danzig question was brought up at the end of August 1939, Goering circumvented the Foreign Office (Auswartigen Amt) and through the Swede Dahlerus established direct contact with the English Foreign Minister Halifax, in order to endeavor for a peaceful solution.

Above as evidence that Goering was opposed to a war of aggression and wished for a peaceful understanding.

(8) v. Weiszacker, State Secretary at Present Rome Vatican. Has knowledge that the consent for the meeting in Munich in September 1938 was obtained through the influence of Goering who wanted to prevent a war under any circumstance. In this meeting Germany's actions up to that point in repudiation of the Versailles Treaty and other treaties were recognized.

(9) Lord Halifax, Ambassador in Washington. Has knowledge that:

a. Reichsmarshal Goring constantly endeavored to bring about in a peaceful way a solution, which he considered necessary, of the problems (anschluss of Austria, Sudetenland and the clarifying of the Danzig question). In November 1937, Lord Halifax - English Foreign Minister - was invited by Goring to come to Germany - on the occasion of this visit, discussions between Goring and Halifax took place in the presence of the English Ambassador Henderson, at which Goring declared openly that Germany considered as necessary the anschluss of Austria as well as the Sudetenland, and a solution of the Danzig question. On Lord Halifax's objection that these questions could not be solved by war, Goring replied that depended on England's attitude and that he, Goring, hoped and wished that the questions would be solved in a peaceful manner.

b. When at the end of August 1939 the Polish question became acute, Dahlerus flew back and forth several times daily, as couriers between Goring and Lord Halifax - Goring had direct exchange of ideas with Lord Halifax, circumventing the foreign office (Auswartigen Amt) and without informing the foreign office in order to do everything to bring about a peaceful solution. The last letter from Lord Halifax was received by Goring a few hours before the English declaration of war. To be used as evidence that Goring was opposed to war of aggression and wanted peaceful understanding.
(10) v. Bodenschatz, General, imprisoned by the Americans. Has knowledge that the occupation of Czechoslovakia in March 1939 took place against Göring’s opposition. Göring had been for a cure at St. Remo since January 1939. He had taken no part in any preliminary discussions, was called back to Berlin in March 1939, advised urgently against it, took part in the final discussion of 15 March, 1939 especially with respect to the question of preventing the shedding of blood through the collision of the two armed forces, and traveled immediately back to St. Remo. Göring did not take part in the entry, he had never set foot in Czechoslovakia (except for a transit journey on the way to Dublin, Ireland in April 1945 for want of another route). As evidence that Göring was opposed to a war of aggression.

(11) Kammerhuber, General of the German Air Forces. At present in American or English captivity. Has knowledge that the Sketch of the Year 1930, which was presented to the Tribunal, was made only for practising purposes and was exclusively based on theoretical assumptions; it was not made by order of the defendant Göring; it was not put before him nor did he have any knowledge of it. To refute statement that defendant had been planning wars of aggression.

(12) Paul Koerner, Secretary of State. Nürnberg Prison. Witness was Secretary of State for the Defendant as Prime Minister of Prussia since 1933 and for the Four Year Plan since 1936. To testify that:

a. Göring instituted the Concentration Camps in 1933 merely in the interest of the security of the state in order to arrest those persons who were a danger to the state. In 1934 by order of the Führer he handed over the supervision of the camps to Himmler.

b. During the period in which he was responsible for the Camps in Prussia he made it a point that the inmates were properly cared for. Complaints regarding ill-treatment were immediately checked and short-comings were rectified. Wherever, here and there, illegal camps were instituted by the SS and the SA these were immediately closed down by Göring.

c. Göring had no prior knowledge of the actions taken against the Jews in the night of 9th to 10th November, 1938. When, in the morning of 10th November, he got to know of it, he made grave reproaches to Goebbels and raised a complaint with Hitler.

d. Of all measures and arrangements which the defendant had taken in his capacity as Plenipotentiary for the Four Year Plan.
Dr. Ramon von Ondarza, Lieutenant Colonel in Medical Corps (Oberfeldarzt) of the Airforce, Berlin. At present probably in an American or English Camp. The witness, who was a member of the personal staff of the defendant and answered all sanitary and medical questions turning up there, has knowledge of the following facts: Goering did not know anything of the experiments carried out on prisoners in Dachau by Dr. Rascher and Dr. Romberg. To refute reproach of committing crimes against humanity.

Bernd v. Brauchitsch, Colonel of the Luftwaffe, Nurnberg Prison. Witness had been chief adjutant of the defendant for many years; has therefore, knowledge of all orders issued by the defendant; especially:

a. Goering had not been informed of the shooting of 50 captured airmen, and condemned the incident sharply when he learned of it.

b. Goering was against the lynching of shot-down enemy terror pilots, and demanded, if necessary, legal proceedings. To refute the accusation, that Goering committed war crimes.

Keller, General of the Luftwaffe. Is Prisoner of the Americans. The witness, in his capacity of being for many years, Chief of the General Staff of the Luftwaffe, has knowledge that:

a. Goering had always been opposed to measures of retaliation against enemy airmen. The Luftwaffe had not issued any orders to this effect.

b. The Luftwaffe neither arrested nor had exterminated troops of sabotage.

c. The Luftwaffe was never concerned with an action 'Wolke' (i.e. intended annihilation of the Concentration Camps in case of threatening enemy occupation.

To refute charge that defendant committed crimes of war.

Gisela Limberger, Chief Secretary - Camp Hersbruck. The witness had been Chief Secretary for many years, and had therefore information on important incidents which form part of the indictment; she knows in particular:
To refute the reproach of committing crimes against humanity.

Walter Funk

(1) Reichsminister Dr. Lammers, Berlin. Now presumably in a prison or camp. Has knowledge that the influence of the accused W. Funk, in connection with the Party's seizure of power and the strengthening of its power over Germany, was very slight, since Funk had no kind of position or influence within the Party, and his position in the state was greatly limited as to power of decision because of higher authorities, especially Goering and Speer.

(2) Dr. Fritz Lamifried, State Secretary. Formerly president of the Prussian State. Now presumably in a camp or prison. Witness was from 1939 to 1943 State Secretary and closest associate of Funk; knows viewpoint of defendant exactly and knows especially that Funk was always opposed to a war of aggression and always protested against the plundering of occupied Eastern Territory.

(3) Emil Puhl, former Vice President of the Reichsbank in Berlin. At present probably in American prison or camp in Frankfurt-on-Main. Has knowledge:

a. That to the end, numerous appeals for help were addressed to Goering by persons who, either were in concentration camps themselves or whose relatives had been sent there. In each case Goering investigated the matter, tried to help and secured release in many cases.

b. During the course of the war, he also helped a great many Jews who appealed to him for help.

c. He had no knowledge of the atrocities committed against Jews and the brutalities committed in concentration camps.
b. Further, that the defendant Funk always took the view in regard to German debts to foreign countries that these must be paid for by export of goods, and that Funk, in the summer of 1944 in Königsberg, when making a speech on occasion of the 400 year anniversary of the University of Königsberg, suggested that these debts should be converted into commercial debts through a European loan to be made by Germany.

c. That Funk in lying down the exchange rates for occupied countries always tried to prevent arbitrary decrease of the exchange rates and to maintain the existing rates as far as possible except for a certain rounding off.

d. That Funk endeavored to withdraw the German occupation money as soon as possible from circulation.

(4) Speech, of the defendant which he made in July 1944 on the occasion of the 400-years jubilee of Königsberg university, presumably under the title: "Economical planning against the mechanism of currencies" and which was also published as a pamphlet later on. This speech could be obtained with certainty at the Reichsbank in Berlin, perhaps at branch office of Reichsbank in Nürnberg or Furth, and most probably at the Chamber of Industry and Commerce in Munich. Speech important for perception and judgement of attitude which defendant took regarding question of clearing with European countries and especially with occupied territories. Speech to show that Funk strongly endeavored to take into consideration the economic conditions and requirements, especially of the occupied territories.

(5) Count Schwerin-Krosigk, former Reich Minister of Finance. Presumably imprisoned by the Americans. Can testify:

a. That the moment the defendant assumed direction of the Reichsbank, the authority to determine the amount of Reich notes to be discounted by the Reichsbank was withdrawn from the President of the Reichsbank and was thenceforth exercised by Hitler himself, according to the proposals of Reich Minister of Finance Count Schwerin-Krosigk, from which the defendant was excluded.

b. That the proposal for a war emergency levy in August 1939 was not made by the defendant, but by Reich Minister of Finance, Count Schwerin-Krosigk.
c. That the preparations for financing the war and for a civilian war economy, mentioned in a letter from the defendant to Hitler, dated 25 August 1939, were initiated in August 1935 by the Reich Ministers concerned, in agreement with Funk.

d. That at that time defendant could delay these preparations no longer, and that prior to that time Funk had not been occupied with these preparations.

(6) Richard Strauss, the well-known composer, in Garmisch-Partenkirchen. To testify that defendant at the request of the witness, Strauss, repeatedly interceded for the rights of the half-Jewish grandchildren of Strauss. Will suffice to secure a sworn statement from the composer, Strauss.

(7) Mrs. Luise Funk, having been admonished to testify truthfully, and having been instructed that this testimony will be submitted to the Court as evidence, has declared that she can at all times support the following statements by oath:

a. Together with my niece, Mrs. Margot Kostler, I visited in November 1938 my husband, Walter Funk, at the Reich Ministry of Economics in Berlin; I came from Hochenlynchoun where I was undergoing medical treatment. As I entered his room, together with Mrs. Kostler, the telephone rang and he began to talk without having seen me or my niece. Thus I witnessed my husband’s telephone conversation while he was quite unaware of it.

From what my husband said over the phone I knew he was speaking to Dr. Goebbels, notably about the excessive measures against Jews which had just been initiated. My husband said among other things to Dr. Goebbels: “Have you gone crazy, Goebbels? To do such swinish things? One must be ashamed of being a German. We are losing our reputation abroad. I try day and night to uphold the good of the people and you knowingly throw it out of the window. If this mess does not stop immediately, I will give up the whole filthy business.”

During the telephone conversation my husband was exceptionally excited, as I have never seen him before. What he had just told Dr. Goebbels he repeated again over the phone.
b. During the years that my husband was State Secretary of the Reich Ministry of Propaganda I know, too, that he often received letters of thanks from Jews who emigrated during those years from Germany and who expressed their gratitude to my husband for assisting them in the transaction of their business affairs and for permitting them to take so much valuable property abroad.

c. One of those Jews, for instance, was a banker from Berlin by name of Berliner, who emigrated to Holland in the 30's. When my husband became Reich Minister of Economics he sent him a telegram from Holland of about the following content: "I congratulate you sincerely to your appointment and above all Germany that it has appointed a man like you as Reich Minister of Economics." I read that telegram myself and discussed it with my husband at that time.

d. I know from my husband's accounts that he suffered badly from the fact that Bormann always knew how to prevent him from speaking to Hitler. When my husband requested an interview with Hitler he had to wait for months before Bormann finally admitted him.

I hereby declare that the above statements are accurate and that I am prepared to take an oath on them in Court.

(sgd) Luise Funk München

q. Hans Fritzsche.

(1) Texts of all his broadcast addresses during years 1932-1945. Last located in Reich Propaganda Ministry, Berlin, Wilhelmplatz. Involved are about 10 (Teitzordonner) that were kept in the radio room of the Air raidshelter cellar of the Propaganda Ministry, entrance on Neuерstrasse, and which still were there on 2 May 1945. Document to prove that against claims of the Indictment defendant did not encourage or incite the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity, to anti-Jewish measures or to ruthless exploitation of occupied countries. Facts relevant because prosecution is likely to select isolated sentences during the main trial to support certain things which they have named against him in Indictment.
(2) Collection of foreign opinions and attacks on defendant. Reich-Ministry for Propaganda, Berlin, Wilhelmplatz. This collection, in 2-3 Leitz folders, was put up for preservation in the Radio Room of the air raid shelter (basement) of the Ministry for Propaganda, entrance Kauerstrasse. Document requested to prove that defendant, even in the opinion of Allied radio commentators during the war, did not agitate anti-Jewish measures or crimes against humanity. Wanted to invalidate accusations of the indictment against him.

(3) Moritz von Schirmeister, Sergeant, Prisoner's No. B264732. No. 265 P.O.W. Camp, Great Britain. Was previously the personal press reporter of Dr. Goebbels and for many years the one through whom Dr. Goebbels communicated with defendant and the reverse. Goebbels transmitted to defendant daily instructions of Dr. Goebbels and in reverse any desires and communications to the minister. Witness knows therefore the relationship between him and Dr. Goebbels during ten years, most closely. Relevant because through interrogation of this witness it will be found that defendant did not bear any responsibility as asserted by prosecution.

r. Wilhelm Frick

(1) Diels, formerly president of province in Hanover. Witness is at disposal of the prosecution. Has knowledge of relation of Reich Minister to the Police of various countries, especially with regard to the objections raised by the Reich Minister of Interior in the exercise of control over the activities of the Police in Prussia and Bavaria. Relevant to show that Frick tried in vain to hold activities of the Police in Prussia and Bavaria within the law and to restrain the Police of various states (Laenderpolizei) from committing encroachments.

(2) Stuckart, formerly Secretary of State. Court House prison in Nurnberg. Was head of control office in ReichMinistry of Interior. Is informed about tasks and activities of this office. This office had no executive power in the occupied territories. Compared to other ministries, it was a concentrating bureaucratic central office for assimilation of laws. For reasons stated above, Frick cannot be held responsible for occurrences in the occupied territories. He had no influence whatever over the executive organs, especially over the Police, in the occupied areas since it was not under his jurisdiction, but entirely under the Reichsfuehrer SS.
(3) Dr. Lammers, Reich Minister, Nurnberg Prison. Person named has knowledge of following facts: That the Fuhrer did not want defendant interfering with police matters which he entrusted exclusively to Himmler. Facts relevant to defense to show that defendant was not responsible for the police, especially the political police, concentration camps, persecution of Jews and police in occupied territories.

(4) General Daluago, probably Court House prison in Nurnberg. Has knowledge that Frick expressed opposition against the Jewish program of 9 November 1938 and demanded that the police should act. Facts relevant because prosecuting authority assumes that Frick was participating in the measures for Jewish program.

(5) "Inside Europe" by John Gunther. Book was published in May 1936. Contains description of Nazi Regime and its leaders, including a chapter about defendant. Relevant as book contains an independent American opinion of that very epoch concerning defendant and his activities.

... Hans Frank...

(1) Dr. Meissner, last position - Minister of State, Berlin. Witness has knowledge that Frank did not belong to inner circle around Hitler; that he was not consulted in a single important political decision; that on the contrary, the relations between him and Hitler were only very loose and became strained in the last years after the constantly repeated offers of his resignation. To refute Count I.

(2) v. dem Bach-Zelewski, last position - General of the SS - In arms and SS Lieutenant-General. Witness has already been heard by International Military Tribunal, namely by the suggestion of the Prosecution. Therefore, continuation of the cross-examination is involved. Witness has knowledge that defendant fought for years against the Security Police (Secret State Police and Security Service), against the SS and especially for four years against the SS Lieutenant-General Krueger; that he has fought against collective measures and against measures in the frame of the resettlement policy and of the Jewish policy, both in the Government General as well as with the central offices in Berlin (Reichsfuhrer - SS Himmler, Reich - Safety Main Office etc.) that the witness has helped the defendant Frank with the elimination of the SS Lieutenant General Krueger, after continuous fights which lasted four years; that the entire Security Police, including the Security Service, was not under the jurisdiction of the Governor General, but under the direct jurisdiction of the central officers in Berlin; that especially the resettlements and the measures against the Jews were carried out exclusively from Berlin (Himmler as Reich Commissioner for the preservation of the German nationality and as Reich Commissioner for Jewish questions); that the Governor General could do nothing against it; that the administration of the concentration camps was exclusively a matter of the Reich Security Main Office in Berlin and that the Governor General had done everything within his powers concerning the feeding of the Polish population; furthermore about the entire Polish policy and the suppressing of the revolt in Warsaw in 1944. Furthermore, about more facts which can be given only after a talk with the witness.

(3) Files referring to Dr. Hans Frank in the State-Police Offices, Staatspolizeiamt in Berlin, Prinz-Albrechstrasse. These files show Frank's fight against the SS, the Gestapo and the SD previous to and during his activity as Governor-General in particular, also the efforts on the part of Frank are shown to limit as much as possible Himmler's activity as Reich Commissioner for the anchorage (Festigung) of the German characteristics in the General Government. The files also show Himmler's activity against Frank during the latter's speeches in 1942 directed against the "Police State" and the negotiations and measures which subsequently resulted in Frank's dismissal from all his party positions (Dismissal as Reichsleider (Reichsleiter) dismissal as President of the Academy for German Law, dismissal as Leader of the "National Socialist League for the Preservation of Law (Rechtswahrerbundes)" etc, and which also brought a prohibition against public speaking decreed by Hitler and which was transmitted to Dr. Frank through Reich Minister Dr. Lemmers (Chief of the Reich Chancellery). Defendant asks that this be compared to his writing of 2 November, 1945.

(4) Speech by Hans Frank in summer of 1942 in Berlin, Munich, Heidelberg and Vienna, also Frank's speech in December 1941 in auditorium of Technical Institute (Rochshule) in Munich. In Palace of Justice in Nurnberg. Document requested to prove that Frank already during the winter of 1941, and especially during summer of 1942 in demonstrations which caused a sensation, spoke to the German and world public and solemnly protested against the police measures taken by Himmler, the Security Police, the Security Service, the Gestapo and the SS.

(5) General von Gienandt, last commander of the Wehrmacht in occupied Polish territory, last residence, Berlin.

- 58 -
Has knowledge that the governor general of the occupied Polish territory had, in military territory, no power of command whatsoever, that especially he could not make any decision in regard to troop movements, requisitions for military purposes, etc. Furthermore, that the governor general was not competent in questions of security police, the counter intelligence, the secret state police, the SS, and the establishment and management of concentration camps. That moreover, he was in a constant and bitter fight with offices of political police, especially with the high SS and police leaders. Refutation of point three and four of the Indictment.

(6) Frank's diaries kept by the Reichstag stenographer Gnauck from the first day of taking over his post in October '39 up to end of war. Should be found with other documents in Palace of Justice, Nurnberg. More detailed information can be given by above mentioned stenographer Gnauck who kept the diaries and who has already been designated as witness. Defendant asks that this be compared with his pleading of 2 Nov 1945. Document requested for refutation of points of Indictment, three and four. The diaries give an exhaustive enumeration of all measures taken and instructions given by Frank during his term of office as G.G. From them can be seen the uninterrupted and embittered fight waged by Frank against the security police, the security service, the SS and the Gestapo who were not under his orders.

(7) Professor Mlynarskyi, last director of the Ossioni Bank in Krakow. To show that defendant's attitude towards the Polish people was absolutely correct. That he rejected all use of force and that he incessantly tried to improve the living conditions of the Polish people and fought a continuous fight against Himmler, the SS, the Gestapo and the SD. Relevant for refutation of Counts 3 and 4 of Brief of 2 Nov 1945.

(8) Dr. Lammers, former Reichsminister and Chief of the Reichs-chancery, in Nurnberg. Witness has knowledge of the facts, for which State Secretary Behler has already been named a witness, especially of the facts that the political police in the General Government lay entirely outside of the jurisdiction of the Governor General and was subject rather to the direct jurisdiction of Himmler and of the higher leaders of the SS and the police in the East, and that defendant protested in countless complaints, petitions, memoranda, and statements of objection against the methods of the SS, the Gestapo, and the SD; that defendant has again and again declared his intention of retiring from his position as Governor General and which was not accepted by Hitler; that at the end of 1941 and in the course of the summer of 1942 he addressed the public in a number of large public demonstrations in the Reich, in order to protest solemnly against Himmler's methods and those of the SS, the Gestapo, and the SD; that he was thereupon removed from all his various offices as Reichs-supervisor (Reichsfuehrer) of the Reich Law Office, as President of the Academy of German Law, as President of the International Law Court, and as head of the National-Socialistic Organization of Preservers of the Law, but was not allowed, however, to retire from position as Governor General and was forbidden by Hitler to make any speeches, etc., of the memorandum of 2 Nov 1945.

Defendant states that his relation to Hitler after the seizure of power, and also even before, was a very loose one; that he participated in only a very few meetings of the Reichs-cabinet and that at these meetings legislative measures were discussed, but no political decisions made; that he took absolutely no part in any decisive determination of policy, as, for instance, the introduction of compulsory military conscription, the occupation of the Rhine land, the occupation of Austria, etc., that his relation to Hitler could by no means be characterized as close or that he was allowed to exert any personal influence, and that Hitler in 1934 remarked to the witness: "Franz will never be Minister of Justice."

Facts relevant for refutation of Indictment points 3 and 4, furthermore indictment point 1, cf. memorandum of 2 Nov 1945.

(9) Josef Buehler, State Secretary in the General Government, Krakau. In Nurnberg. Has knowledge that defendant had no authority of command over police organization and the SS troops stationed in the G.G. (General Government); that these were directly subordinate to the RFSS (Reichs Fuehrer SS) and to the chief of the German police Himmler and that in no way could he influence the measures of the Gestapo and the SD (security service); that he was in no way connected with the establishment and administration of the concentration camps and that it was prohibited to members of the G.G. to even enter the K.Z.'s (concentration camps); that from the first day of his taking office as a G.G. he was in constant fight with the SS, the Gestapo and SD, and also with Himmler and the higher SS and police leaders of the East and that not until 1944 did he learn through the press chief, Gascher about the occurrences in the Camp of Maidansk. That no compulsion by the civil servants of the C.G. was exerted on Polish laborers to take up work in Germany; that a great number of questions were directly dealt with by the authorities of the Reich, especially the questions of labor by the General Commissioner for Labor, Sauckel, the question of industry by the General Commissioner for industry, Funk, and the deputy of the Four Year Plan, Goering, and in particular, the so-called policy on Jews was managed directly by Himmler in his capacity as Reichs Commissioner for the Affairs of the People; that the defendant never gave nor agreed to an order for the shooting of hostages; that he was never in accord with Himmler's directions on the so-called importance of racial descent; that he constantly fought for equality between the German and Polish populations in regard to food; that the introduction of compulsory labor was necessary in the chaotic situation after the Polish breakdown and the flight of the Polish Government. The witness can also testify that the defendant protested in innumerable memoranda to Himmler and Lemmers against the encroachments and measures of the SS, the Gestapo, the SD and the higher SS and police leaders and that he submitted his resignation at least 12 times without it being accepted. That under these conditions toward the end of 1941 and in the summer of 1942 he addressed himself to public opinion in great speeches in Berlin, Heidelberg, Vienna and Munich to solemnly make representations against the constantly growing power of Himmler, Bormann, etc., of the SS, the Gestapo and the SD, and that as a consequence Hitler put a ban on his speeches. He was informed of this by Lemmers. That in the time to follow his position as Governor General was only concerned with purely administrative matters and was only representative.

These facts to refute points 3 and 4 of the accusation, compared with brief of 2 November 1945.

(10) General of the Ordinary Police a.d. Cremnitz, Osterhofen by Bayrischzell (Upper-Bavaria). Has knowledge that the defendant, Dr. Frank, had been involved in the heaviest fights with the SS, the Gestapo and the SD, and particularly with Himmler and his plenipotentiaries, particularly the higher SS and Police Leaders, the commissioners for the establishment of German Nationality and that this fight assumed such wide proportions that Frank repeatedly was close to arrest by the Gestapo or the SD. To refute points 3 and 4 of the indictment.

(11) Dr. Naumann, last Chief of Division Food in the government of the General government. Last residence: Dresden. Has knowledge that an attempt was made to give equal treatment to the Polish people as far as food was concerned. That after the military and political breakdown of the former Polish state everything was done to insure the food supply of the Polish people, that not less than 600,000 tons of cereals were imported from the Reich. That the requests of the Wehrmacht for cereals were never filled, and that, especially in questions of food, defendant was engaged in a continuous fight with the highest Reich authorities.

(12) Dr. Simon Beck, Attorney in Munich, Schleißhauerstrasse 8/IV. From 1942-1944, the witness was, as Major in the Armed Forces, leader of the Counter Intelligence at Warsaw, and as such, was subordinated to Admiral Canaris. In the year 1943, he made an agreement with the defendant Frank that, in his capacity as Counter Intelligence Officer, he was to meet the leader of the Polish Defense movement, General Bor, e.g., his plenipotentiary, in order to bring about a pacification in the German-Polish relations and to achieve a lessening of tension in this manner. This agreement and the witness's consequent efforts were carried but behind the back of the SS and the Gestapo, e.g. of the SD, and its aim was to hinder on the part of the SS and SD, all collective measures against the Polish population and the Jews. The Gestapo, however, learned of the negotiations between the witness and commissioner, General Bor, which led to the arrest of the witness in the year 1944. His life was just barely spared.

(13) General Ritter von Epp, Reichsstatthalter in Bayern, München, Prinzregentenstr. Interned at Camp Oberursel. Witness has knowledge that defendant after receipt of 3 reports from 1 June 1933, about crimes in the Dachau concentration camp (compare with documents 641-FS, 642-FS and 643-FS), ordered the indictment proceedings for murder; that defendant, since the officials of the prosecution did not receive permission to enter the concentration camp for the purpose of further inquiries, turned the matter over to the Bavarian Minister President Siebert as defendant's immediate superior; and that thereupon he called a session of the cabinet of the Bavarian administration of the time under the chairmanship of the Reichsstatthalter, several other members of the administration, and also Himmler. At this session of the ministerial council Himmler protested against the carrying out of inquiries of the prosecution in the Dachau concentration camp. Defendant thereupon demanded that the whole Dachau concentration camp be surrounded by units of the "Landespolizei" in order to re-establish the state sovereignty in this manner and make possible the carrying out of the inquiry procedure of the prosecution.
As no agreement could be reached about the matter at the ministerial conference, defendant reported the status of the matter to Berlin to Reich Minister of Justice Dr. Guertner, who appeared in person in Munich after about a week in order to talk the case over with defendant. Defendant did not wish to give up his point of view, Dr. Guertner declared himself ready to bring the matter before Hitler. Hitler decided that he did not wish a criminal prosecution with the reason that these occurrences had been a result of the revolution. The occurrences became later devoid of significance because a law concerning the general regulation of criminal acts committed during the period of the taking over of power was proclaimed.

(14) Dr. Heldinger, last State Prosecutor, Chief of the Chancellery of the G.G., in Krakau. Further information can be given by Miss Helene Krafczyk, now in Nurnberg. Has knowledge about same facts as previously named witness, Josef Buehler — that from the first day of defendant's taking office he endeavored in the fight against the SS, the Gestapo and the SD (Security Service) to realize the idea of a State of Law in occupied Poland, especially in the treatment of Poles, Jews and Ukrainians and also that defendant's main activity consisted in the fight against measures of Himmler and those of many of the Reich's organs. Defendant wishes these to refute points 3 and 4 of the accusation.

(15) Pallezieux, last position, specialist for art at the castle in Krakow, seat of the Governor General. Address, Fischhausen-Neuhaus near Schliersee in Bavaria. Has information that the collecting and securing of art treasures in the GG (Government General) and especially at the seat of the Governor General in Krakow was done in a perfectly legal manner and officially. That the Governor General did not transfer any art treasures into his own possession nor into that of his family. That all the art treasures on hand were always spoken of as Government property and that an official catalogue was published of them. To refute Count 3.

(16) Professor Dr. Kneisl, last reported (Referent) on questions pertaining to art in the G.G. with the official residence in the castle of Krakow, Vienna. Has knowledge that an index of all art objects on hand was kept and published in the Government-General. That on principle a difference was made between (property of the public hand) public property and private property. That the Governor General never transferred art objects of the occupied Polish territory to his private property or the property of his family. To refute Charge No. 3.
(17) Document "Warsaw Ghetto", Palace of Justice, Nurnberg. This report was presented by the American Prosecutor Judge Jackson, 21 Nov, 1945 to the International Military Tribunal for reference. Document requested to prove that the report was not addressed to Frank, nor requested by him, nor that he had anything to do with the events in Warsaw Ghetto, especially that he participated in it in any form. To refute Counts Three and Four of accusation.

Grand Admiral Doenitz

(1) Admiral Judge Eckhardt, Prisoner of war camp Gabrecke near Ostend, Belgium. Witness knows all events and orders which were of importance for the examination by international law of sea warfare as conducted by Germany.

(2) Konteradmiral Godt, Prisoner of War camp, Oberursel, near Frankfurt am Main.

(3) Lt Commander Hessler (retired), can be contacted through British Naval C-in-C, Germany (G.M.S.A) Glueckstadt on the Elbe.

Witnesses 2 and 3 know of the events which occurred on the staff of the Commander of the U-boats, especially with regard to communiques and orders issued from there and to the directives to commanders concerning their tasks.

(4) Lt Commander Metzler, latterly with the Admiral commanding U-boats in Neustadt in Holstein. Can be contacted through the British Flag Officer Schleswig-Holstein in Floehm.

(5) Lt Eck, British Court prison, Hamburg. Witness knows that after the sinking of the Greek ship "Poleus" in the spring of 1944, he gave the order on his own initiative to destroy the rescue rafts, without having received an order from the accused or without any justification for his action. Furthermore, the witness knows that he did not report his action regarding the rafts to the C-in-C U-boats.

On 20 October 1945, witness was condemned to be shot by a military court in Hamburg. Witness requested delay in execution of the sentence be effected until witness had given his evidence before International Tribunal.

Facts deposed to by the witness from the 1st to the 5th are of importance to defense to refute the allegation that the accused approved of or himself carried out war crimes.
Kontreadmiral Wagner. Probably prisoner of war camp Oberursel near Frankfurt. Witness knows that the accused in his official position as leader, and later as commander in chief of the submarines was exclusively responsible for formation and tactics of U-boats, and that on the contrary he had nothing to do with the strategy of sea warfare and was never involved in it.

Fact is of importance for defense because it refutes the allegation that the accused participated in the military plans and preparations for a war of aggression. This proposal for evidence is submitted with what individual war crimes the accused is to be charged, a matter which is still to be done by specifying the accusations. A proposal for the production of the documents will be supplies separately.

Rear-Admiral Leo Kreisch, leader of the U-boats in Italian waters, most recently a prisoner of war, at first, in a British prisoner-of-war-camp on the island Fehmarn in Schleswig-Holstein; later transferred from there, in December, to an unknown destination.

Naval Captain Harro Roesing, leader of the U-boats in western waters, most recently a prisoner of war in Bergen, Norway in British captivity.

Frigate Captain Teddy Suhren, leader of the U-boats in Norwegian waters, most recently in Narvik, in British captivity.

Defense counsel proposes to obtain an affidavit from above named officers in order to prove that there was no command from Doenitz calling for the destruction of the means of rescue of sunken ships or the death of those who were shipwrecked.

Council for the defense of Grossadmiral (Admiral of the Fleet) Doenitz, states that on 9 November, 1945 he submitted a petition for presentation of a number of war diaries of U-boats and war diaries of the commanders of the U-boats and Seekriegslieitung) Sea Warfare Command, and that up to date (20 Jan 146) he had not received a decision on that petition. Petitions again for following documents:

a. Handbook for U-Boat Commanders. Important because it contains the orders existing for the U-boat commanders regarding sinking and rescue work at the time of beginning of the war.
b. Permanent War Orders of the Commander in Chief of the U-Boats, Edition 1942. Important, because they contain the orders read by counsel on occasion of questioning of Korvettenkapitaen (Lieutenant Commander) Moehls, with regard to the saving of ship officers and plane crews.

c. Permanent War Orders of the commander-in-Chief of U-Boats, Edition, 1944. Important, because they contain the order: "Crew is to be saved insofar as possible, as not to endanger the boat."

d. Current orders of the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats. Important, because the so-called Laconia-Order of Sept 17, 1942, D 630 is contained therein and because from its contents lowering danger for U-Boats by air surveillance can be seen.

e. War Diaries of following U-Boats.

i) UZ of September, 1939, regarding the sinking of Danish steamer "Vendia" with the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats. Important in reference to Document D 641.

ii) U 31 of May, 1940, regarding the sinking of the "Shaaf Head" with the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats. Important in reference to Document D 642.

iii) U 156 regarding the sinking of the "Laconia" of September, 1942, the rescue measures taken there.

iv) U 507, our attack on the rescue boats and the further orders issued. Important in reference to document D 466 and D 630.

v) U 105, of January 1943, regarding the sinking of the Allied sail cutter with the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats. Important according to Document D 646.

vi) U 247, of July, 1944, regarding the sinking of "Noreen Mary" with the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats. Important according to Document D 645.

vii) U 386 from fall 1942 to spring 1943 with the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats. Important, because it is said to refer to the boat, mentioned by Korvettenkapitaen (Lt Commander) Loehle in his testimony of January 15; the boat's commander is said, not to done anything against an Allied plane crew of a shot down airplane and therefore, was reprimanded by the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats.

f. War Diaries of the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats from 1939-1945. These war diaries are of importance, because they contain material:

i) On the cases of sinkings, mentioned under the preceding number as far as they became known from individual reports to the Commander-in-Chief of the U-Boats.

ii) On the orders, received from the Seekriegsleitung (Sea Warfare Command) regarding the carrying-out of the U-boat warfare.

iii) On the endangering of U-boats by armed merchant ships.

iv) On the Laconia-Case and the pre-happening of the order of Sept 17, 1942 (D 630)

v) On the development of the orders regarding rescue measures.

vi) On the complete removal of the German U-boats from the water surface by the Allied air forces.

The purpose of Opinion Research is to discover the opinions or habits of a community on some particular subject. You can also, if you need to, find out (i) which groups hold each opinion or have a particular habit; (ii) how they came to form those opinions or habits; (iii) how deeply the opinions or habits are rooted; (iv) whether the opinions or habits are increasing or decreasing in strength.

For instance, the Allies might be urging a certain policy through their propaganda and you might want to know whether this propaganda was being well received locally or being resented. Or you might want to know what proportion of the people in the rural districts came into the town at least once a week. Or after liberation the relief organisations might want to know whether there was a greater need for clothing or for food in your district. In a village with a few dozen cottages you could ask every individual person for his opinion or about his usual custom in connection with the question you were investigating. Obviously you couldn't do that in a province with several hundred thousand inhabitants. You could try asking a few of the leading citizens, but you might find that the local officials had been mostly collaborators and that leaders of resistance had had of necessity to avoid too much contact with the general public. Any individuals, in fact, unless their administrative position has kept them in touch with conditions throughout the community, are likely to represent the views only of the particular section with which they have been in contact.

Sampling

You therefore take a sample of the whole community and test their views by interviewing them. Suppose you decide that you and your assistants will have time to interview 100 people before your report has to go back to HQ or before you yourself need take any decisive action. These hundred people must obviously be representative as nearly as possible of the whole community. How are you going to choose them?

There are three possible methods that come to mind. The first is merely to ask the first hundred people you meet. The results of that are obvious: you are going to get the opinions only from the particular neighbourhood or class of people with whom you happen to be in contact or who are accustomed to be in the streets or cafes or factories at the particular time you chance to go there. There would probably be important groups of the community that you didn't meet at all. The sample, in fact, would be an unfair one.

A second method would try to be less haphazard and strictly numeric. Suppose you could get a list of all the people in the community (a Food Office list, for instance). If you picked every fiftieth name or every hundredth name, you ought on the law of averages to get a perfectly fair sample. But you need a big sample before the law of averages begins to work. You all know that if you toss a penny often enough it will come down heads just as often as tails, but that if you toss it only a few times it may come down heads six times and tails twice. In the same way, a small sample picked on this numerical system may be misleading; you may get six times as many men as women, whereas the real proportions might be about equal. Consequently, so you won't have time to interview a large number of people, this method is also likely to give false results even though the principle behind it is sound.

The third method is probably best. It consists of dividing the population into various groups who are likely to have a similar attitude to the particular question you are investigating. Let us take a community of 200,000, partly rural and partly urban, and say that we want to answer the question we raised before - whether there is a greater need for clothes or for food. We can first assume that about half the population (or 100,000) are adults. Next it is clear that this is a household problem, and therefore we need not make any division between men and women, for it is the heads of households that we want. Here are some possible groupings that might occur to you:
1. Urban households
2. Rural
3. Households with more than 4 children
4. Purely adult households
5. Mixed household - 2 or 3 adults and 2 or 3 children
6. Households deprived of a housewife (mother or older sister)
7. " " " male breadwinner (father or brother)
8. " in the higher income group
9. " " middle "
10. " " lower "

These are a few groupings, many of them overlapping, which occur at once, and if we took some people from each group we would have covered most of the community. But although we should be fairly sure that all groups were represented in our sample, we could not be sure that they were represented sufficiently strongly in proportion to other groups. In the income groups, for instance, we might be wrong if we interviewed the same number of people from the higher and lower income groups, for there might be three times as many poorer people as richer. Consequently we not only have to divide our community into groups, but to assess the strength of each group. Let us assume, for instance, that rather less than one-third of the people live in towns. Then out of the 100 interviews which we planned to have, we might allot 30 to town people and 70 to rural. Again, out of the rural ones, suppose we believe that there are twice as many of the middle income level as there are of the higher income level, and twice as many again at the lowest level. Then we could divide our 70 country interviews up so as to give 10 to richer, 20 to the middle income group and 40 to the poorer. Again, inside each of these groups we must divide between the types of households - those with big families, those with small ones, etc. In the poorer group, for instance, we might find that half the people had families of 4 children or more, a quarter had mixed households, and a quarter were purely adult, so we would break down our 40 interviews into groups of 20, 10 and 10 in each of those categories. In this way the total sample of 100 is gradually taking shape and being divided up so that each group is not only represented, but represented in proportion to its numbers in the community. When you come to start your interviews, therefore, you will know already just the sort of people you want to see, and the numbers of each sort whom you want to see in order to get a fair picture of the ideas of the community on this question.

You will see that we have assumed that you already know a little about the composition of the population - the proportion in town and country and the proportions of rich to poor etc. Probably you can get such statistics from the local records. If not, then there is a method for finding out for yourselves. First divide the town roughly into factories, markets, shops, slums and residential districts. Then ask a small number of well-informed people about the make-up of their district, and average the answers. Doctors and priests, for instance, can often give very helpful information about the composition of their districts so far as geographical distribution and income level is concerned.

It is very important to realise, of course, that the groupings which have been made for this particular question might be quite wrong for some other question. If, for instance, the administration were considering a tax on matches, and you were asked to find out what the public reaction would be, you would have to make very different groupings. You would have to divide between those who cooked with electricity and those who didn't, between smokers and non-smokers and perhaps between those with cigarette lighters and those without.

There is one other obvious point to bear in mind - that in some cases a problem may concern principally one particular group. If you wanted to know the reaction to a proposal to start a government-subsidised tanning works, you would want to know principally the attitudes of local tanners and leather workers, and you might not have to bother much about the community as a whole.

Grouping Questions

For the purposes of the actual interviewing, groupings fall into two classes - those groups you can differentiate by observation and planning, and those you can't. For instance, you can differentiate roughly between men in the higher and lower income levels by seeing how a man is dressed, and if you have interviewed a lot of richer men in the morning, you can make sure that your group of poorer men is represented by concentrating on poorer ones in the afternoon. Or you can differentiate your countrymen by planning to go into the country for your interviews. But some groups - such as those having big families - you couldn't differentiate for yourself. If, therefore, such a group were important to you, as it was with the 'food or clothes' question, you would have to ask a casual question about it at your interview. In the same way you would have, in the 'match tax' question, to ask grouping questions about lighters and cooking in order to get your relevant groups represented. You also want to take notes of as many general particulars as you can gather about the person interviewed - age, married or single, job, address and locality from which he or she comes, approximate income, etc. You can probably find these out easily enough without having to ask direct questions. The information is useful because it may give you a line on certain groupings which may be important - that it is mostly state employees who feel some particular grievance, for instance, and that any propaganda should therefore be aimed principally at them. If you do find that any such group of people has an importance, you must be sure that they are represented in your sample in their correct proportion (and you will have to ask the 'grouping' question to do so - possibly even carrying out a further investigation).

Take care, however, that 'grouping' questions are not inserted in the conversation at a place where they may affect the main question. For example, you might be finding out what nations people most lacked. A woman who had just told you, in answer to your question, that she had three young children, would then be likely to ask for more milk, whereas really she might be in greater need of meat.

Checking grouping results.

If, after you have finished and are checking through your results, you find that one of your groups is badly under-represented, the only real remedy is to get some more interviews. But it necessary you can adjust your results by scaling the groups down to the right proportions. Suppose that you know that there ought to be twice as many men with children as men without, but that in your sample you have equal numbers of each. Then count each man without children as one half when recording your results. This will of course decrease the total numerical value of your sample. Don't multiply the number of men with children, for that would make your sample look numerically larger - and therefore more dependable - than it actually was.

Leadership groups

Again, a grievance which may be spreading discontent through a whole community may arise from some special group which occupies some key or leadership position. If you can find out the opinion of that particular group and the way to cure their grievance, then you will not need to find out the views of the general public, who may be sympathetic to and influenced by the group but have their views which are quite valuable and distorted, but you must remember that leadership groups will not now necessarily come from those elements from which they could have been expected before the war. Indeed, one of the first jobs of the opinion researcher will be to discover which elements at any particular time and in any particular place or any particular question do have leadership influence.

This question of a leadership group brings up another important point. If you are doing a survey on a particular question which concerns a whole community, do not, even though there is an influential group, give this group undue representation in your general survey; they must be treated in proportion to any other group so far as present opinion is concerned, for their influence will already be represented in the views of others, if it is sufficiently strong. It may perhaps be worth doing a separate investigation to find out the nature and causes of the opinions of the leadership group as a guide to the possible development in the future. For what the leaders think today the community as a whole is liable to think tomorrow.
Groups and Individuals.

Remember that your conclusions from the samples of any groups will represent that group as a group, not as individuals. Suppose, for instance, that you were putting the question 'Did you listen to the 9 o'clock news last night?'. If you asked one hundred people one week, another hundred the next, etc., for five weeks, and found that in each day about 60 people had listened, you could conclude that as a group about 60% listened on any night. You could not conclude that 60 individuals out of 100 always listened and 40 never listened. Some individuals would listen some nights, others on other nights. The habits of groups, in fact, can remain stable even though the habits of the individuals may vary from night to night. Each time, therefore, you must only pay attention to the answer to that question 'Did you listen last night?'. You are not interested in whether or not the man listened three nights ago.

Questioning:

There are three methods of questioning:

i) by written questionnaire

ii) by 'open' interview, when you admit that you are interrogating people

iii) by 'covert' interview, when you pretend to be having a normal conversation.

Here are a few suggestions which apply to all three:

Questions should be in the same words and in the same order for each interview.

Don't ask two questions at once - e.g., 'Do you like cats and dogs?'.

Avoid lengthy questions, especially those involving the connection of more than two or three basic ideas.

Avoid questions involving complex or unforeseeable conditions - E.g., 'If in four months' time you are not employed in your previous occupation, would you be willing to consider the possibility ...'.

Avoid questions whose wording biases the person interviewed - inclines him, perhaps unwittingly, to answer definitely when his real opinion is uncertain or perhaps even of the opposite nature. This happens very easily when (a) the form of words suggests that the interviewer expects e.g., a positive answer, as in 'The Premier made a fine speech, don't you think?', or (b) the words used are of a highly coloured emotional nature, as in 'Isn't it grand not to see those filthy Huns about?'. (It would be wrong to deduce from a positive answer to this that the person answering thought that all Germans were 'filthy' - or that life now was 'grand'). Don't, in fact, ask questions which have a strong emotional content unless you are seeking an emotional rather than a rational reply.

Avoid the juxtaposition of two questions which are such that the answer to the first puts a kind of moral compulsion on the answerer to give a similar answer to the second - e.g., 'Should Great Britain pool all military resources and secrets with U.S.A.?'. Answer: 'Yes' (or 'No') - followed by the question 'And with Russia?'.

A less obvious case of the same fault would be this: Qn. 'Have you discussed the possibility of Unemployment during the past week? If the answer is Yes, and the next question is 'Do you think that the Government should at once put through a Beveridge scheme in full?'. There is the same chance that the answerer will feel morally compelled to answer Yes again. (No doubt he is also logically compelled to do so, but this isn't the point. Opinion Research isn't conducted with a view to indoctrinating - or propagandaizing for - logical thought-sequences. It is conducted to find out how people actually are thinking).
Avoid questions, the answers to which would depend on accurate memory of things the answerer is likely to have forgotten, or is likely to have only the vaguest memory of - e.g., "How long did a pair of shoes last you before the war?".

As far as possible, ask the person being interviewed about his or her own experiences, reactions, opinions. The only point of asking such a question as 'Do you think most people agree with you?' is to see whether the person thinks he belongs to a majority or a minority. The result of such a question throws no light on the true situation, but it may throw light on what people believe, possibly wrongly, to be the true situation.

The words and phrases used should be simple and in common day-to-day use among all groups of the community, and should mean the same thing to everybody - e.g., in the question 'Are the soldiers responsible for the illegitimate children?', the word 'responsible' is ambiguous.

Where the individual is being asked to choose between alternatives, the alternatives must be given as early in the question as possible.

You want your information to be precise. Ask 'How many cigarettes did you smoke yesterday?' - not 'How many did you smoke last week?' or 'How many are you smoking nowadays?'. Avoid words like 'much', 'little', 'recently', etc. Vague questions produce vague answers.

Questions should appear natural and should fit easily into the sort of conversation the interviewer will be initiating.

As regards Answers, the following general maxims are worth remembering:

For the purposes of correlation and interpretation of results, it is desirable that there should be only a limited number of possible answers to any given question. At the same time, care should be taken not to force one of the predetermined sets of answers. More positively, leave room for 'Neither' or 'Both' or 'All' or 'None', when two or more alternatives are suggested by the form of the question.

In particular, leave room for 'I don't know' or 'I don't care' or even 'I couldn't care less'. These or similar answers may be of very great significance - at least they will almost certainly be honest.

If the question misfires, i.e., if the person questioned seems simply disinclined to deal with the matter or to fail to see that an answer is called for, don't persist or badger him. (Incapacity or disinclination to answer an ostensibly plain question may itself be a significant result).

Unless they are hopelessly lengthy, always record the actual words of the answerer. Certainly never introduce personal interpretation into a summary of the answer given. Assessment of the value and meaning of a 'question' answer is best done after the interview, and, if possible, with the aid of an independent judge.

Clearly, not all these maxims are directly applicable to your work. But they help to show the spirit in which any satisfactory interviewing must be carried out. The essence of the matter is: Do all you can to get a man to show his mind on the problem you are interested in. That is the positive goal, and all the "Do's and Don'ts" listed above are merely aids to it.

Interviewing

The interviewer must remember that his personal relationship with the man questioned may affect the interview - for instance, the man might answer slightly differently if questioned by a uniformed interviewer or by a plain-clothes interviewer, or by someone of a different social class or by someone known to be in a Government job. The interviewer should be as neutral as possible (not even showing an attempt to hide any strong convictions of his own), and should keep to his natural personality rather than try to act a part. Though the actual questions must always be the same, the approach and the conversation will vary with each interviewer and with each person interviewed. Wherever practicable, choose your interviewers so that they have a ready-made approach. In some cases it is better to choose an interviewer from the same environment as the persons he will have to interview. On other questions, people may talk more freely to a stranger with whom they have no common background.

Third parties should never be present. Pay attention to suitability of time and place - don't let the interview be a bore. For instance, girls at a dance-hall are unlikely to want to discuss newspapers.

Informants' Panel

It will be useful if you can create a panel of informants who can report to you at regular intervals the thoughts and opinions of those circles among whom they move. Preferably you want to have informants in as many different circles as possible. Such informants can not only give you information on specific questions, but can tell you what other subjects are in people's minds, thereby perhaps suggesting other questions which ought to be investigated. You must know these informants well, and how any biases they are likely to have. You must decide how much and how little to tell them of the reason for which you require their information. You must decide whether you are going to question them or rely on them supplying information to you - this may be a question of how busy you are as well as of how reliable they are. They can also tell you about rumours. It is important that your contacts with them should be regular and frequent before their impressions get blurred. They must be able to observe and to report clearly - either verbally or in writing, and preferably they should be methodical. Remember that the men directly concerned in a situation doesn't always have the best view of it - for instance, a grocer in a mining village might give a better picture of conditions among miners than could a miner himself. Obviously, of course, security considerations are the most important of all.

Observation

Also you obviously must not forget that observation, though it cannot greatly help in ascertaining opinion, can help enormously over questions of behaviour or conditions. But observation can be made much more valuable if you apply some of the rules of research. Make sure, for instance, that you know specifically what you are looking for. Then make sure that you look as far as possible at people in different groups and not at a lot of people in the same group. Also choose your time for observation. If you want to find out about children's shoes, don't go during school hours; just before or after school when children are on their way home probably the best times. On some specific questions a couple of hours of intelligently planned observation can probably give you a very fair idea of the conditions in any urban area.

One other tip on observation - if you are observing a crowd or a queue, don't note the first dozen or twenty people in order for people are liable to be in two or three or even bigger parties. Instead, note every 10th person you meet or pass in the queue, and you will get a fairer sample.

Covert Questioning

Best results are obtained by open investigation, but accuracy may be necessary for two reasons, which may exist simultaneously:
OPINION RESEARCH

1. If questions of security make it unsafe for the interviewer openly to ask questions, or for the person being questioned to make honest replies, in this case the interviewer has an apparently casual conversation with the person to be interviewed. This conversation should not only lead up to the questions, but should also camouflage them. The man interviewed should ideally pay no attention to the whole incident, and it should be arranged not to occur to him to give any subsequent thought to the questions or his answers. The interview is a partial failure if the subject of the investigation remains for any length of time in the man's attention. The technique is referred to as security technique.

2. If the object of the investigation is such that it would not command itself to the person being interviewed. Here, questions are asked as in a normal investigation, but they are chosen in such a way that they enable the investigator to make an oblique instead of a direct approach to his problem. The technique is referred to as indirect questioning technique.

In both methods the investigator must bear in mind the reasons for using secrecy and the pitfalls to be avoided. Moreover it is possible, secret questionnaires should be tested before use. The security problem and the need for producing an unbiased and natural conversation can be tested if the interviewers interrogate one another before going into the field.

If security technique is used, the questions must be few in number and must fit readily into a conversation. (Approach to victim depends in part on the relation of the investigator to the man to be interviewed, as there are some subjects which one would not normally discuss with strangers, others not with one's associates.)

Experience suggests that about five questions - including any classification questions necessary for checking the validity of the sample or for grouping the population - are as many as can be fitted into short actual conversations.

As little writing as possible should be done in the field. After each interview the interviewer should make his notes, but he should not write either in the presence of the person he has interviewed or in a public place, for fear of attracting attention.

Care must be taken to minimise the chance of someone being questioned twice by different interviewers. If the interviews are confined to places of work or homes this is unlikely, but often such restriction will be impracticable. One solution would be for each interviewer to confine his attention to a particular type of person, but this removes the possibility of an internal check on each interviewer (by the comparison of his results with the general result). It also adds to the risk of making a dangerous pattern of behaviour, so enabling a skilful observer to discover that an organised investigation by interviewers is in progress.

Indirect questioning is best illustrated by example. Suppose that the following situation exists in a town where you are working. The unskilled workers in a large factory are dissatisfied with a recently announced wage award, and there is a threat of strike action of an illegal (not union-authorized) kind. It will be possible to maintain some production by attracting labour from other less essential plants. The present situation is that the owners and union officials have issued appeals to the men to continue work while negotiations continue. The men are disinclined to comply. The Labour Supply Department wants to know the size of the likely demand for unskilled labour in the event of a strike.

You know that:

1. The strikers will receive no income during the strike.
2. Married men, particularly those with young children, will find this a deterrent.
3. The women of the town are not earning anything.

It might be impossible to ask workers outright whether they were going to strike, it the answer might be deduced from the answers to other questions. For instance, a problem could be approached by finding out:

1. The strikers will receive no income during the strike.
2. Married men, particularly those with young children, will find this a deterrent.
3. The women of the town are not earning anything.

1. If questions of security make it unsafe for the interviewer openly to ask questions, or for the person being questioned to make honest replies, in this case the interviewer has an apparently casual conversation with the person to be interviewed. This conversation should not only lead up to the questions, but should also camouflage them. The man interviewed should ideally pay no attention to the whole incident, and it should in any event not occur to him to give any subsequent thought to the questions or his answers. The interview is a partial failure if the subject of the investigation remains for any length of time in the man's attention. The technique is referred to as security technique.

1. A man's earnings.
2. A man's savings.
3. A man's rate of saving.
4. His responsibilities towards his family.

The 'representative of war savings club' cover might enable answers to questions on these points to be obtained in open interviews. From the answers, the economic ability to strike can be determined by finding who has reserves and how long they will last.

An investigation with the security technique might determine which workers expected the negotiations to be successful, and whether they liked their jobs.

Testing the Strength of Opinions during Secret Investigations

It is sometimes difficult to test the strength of an opinion on a subject which has to be approached indirectly - if for instance you want to answer the question 'How much risk and discomfort will these people be prepared to suffer for their opinions?'. Normally, a series of graded questions would be asked, just as one might to test the strength of interest in an advertisement, ask 'Did you see it?', 'Did you read it?', 'Did you cut it out?'. You cannot ask of workers in a labour dispute 'Will you protest?', 'Will you go slow?', 'Will you strike?', since to probe and write answers about personal sacrifice is not only likely to provoke suspicions but also provokes resistance. Consequently, instead of asking one question every one of the questions, the investigation is divided so that similar sections of the community are interviewed, but no individual is asked more than one of the questions during the interview. (The investigator must compare the various samples obtained in order to ensure that all the same groups are representated in the same (correct) proportions). The interviewer should also try to discover how long the individual has held a particular view and the reason for his holding it (personal experience, influence of friends, reading).

Covert investigations are to be used only when open investigations are impracticable. The results of a covert investigation cannot be accurate. Precision in sampling, and in the framing of questions has to be sacrificed in covert work, in order to increase security. Three types of security have to be considered:

1. The security of the questioner
2. The security of the investigation
3. The security of the respondent.

(He may have different ideas on security to those held by the investigator: there is a need for a field test).

Conclusion

None of these pieces of advice would give you perfect results. It is very unlikely in any case that you will have the time or opportunity to follow all of them. But if you bear them in mind and at least try to adapt the work you can do to these methods, you will certainly get conclusions which are far more valuable than any you could get by guesswork or by asking a few friends. Remember that you can't get the best picture of opinion among Roman Catholics by asking the Cardinal.

Reporting deductions; correlations, recommendations.

So far, we have dealt with methods of getting information. In this lecture I want to indicate the best means of using the information one is able to gather. The best way is to take a concrete example.

Suppose that you are aiding the administration in the town of T. The population, although initially most friendly towards the temporary administration, has however, shown itself uncooperating in respect of certain recent orders. The various forms issued for administrative purposes have apparently never been filled in, or at least they have never been received back. Casual reports also show that there is a certain amount of grumbling about the slowness with which food material aid is arriving in the district. In this situation, you have undertaken over a number of days some 60 covert interviews among those sections of the population which you consider to be the leading elements (and therefore the elements which you consider should be approached first in connection with your problem).

Let us suppose that you have put five questions in each of these interviews. The first (whatever its precise form) was designed to discover whether food - rather than clothing or any other personal convenience - was the shortage most keenly felt by the person interviewed. The second question was on the same lines, only it concerned clothes. The third was framed to discover whether there were real irritation at the shortage of local and national and general world news. The fourth question dealt with the local postal service, and was designed to show whether there were any general grounds for dissatisfaction with it. The fifth question, to be put as casually as possible during a routine or business interview (say at the municipal centre) was simply whether the person interviewed had in fact heard of or complied with one of the recent administrative orders.

Let us assume that you have had time to make a rough schedule showing how each individual you interviewed answered each of these questions, and to what relevant group of the population each of these individuals belonged. (Illustrate on black-board).

The first and most obvious conclusions to be drawn are got by simple addition and by comparison of the different sets of figures. It may turn out that everyone is dissatisfied with the current postal service, or it may be that there are more people dissatisfied owing to the clothes shortage than are dissatisfied owing to the food shortage.

But there will certainly be results of a more interesting and informative kind than these. Reading along your schedule from left to right and from top to bottom, you may well find that the clothes shortage is particularly great in the rural areas and the food shortage particularly acute in the urban areas - or it may be vice versa. You may also find an interesting correlation between those who are dissatisfied with the postal service and those who failed to comply with the recent administrative orders. Or there may be no such correlation, but the signs of a correlation between food shortage and disobedience - further evidenced by the manifest tones of grumbling with which people answered questions on these two subjects.

All these possible combinations and correlations are of a kind that would readily occur to you as possible factors affecting the original administrative problem - the population's failure to comply with recent orders. But there is a world of difference between a conclusion which strikes one as plausible - the kind of conclusion one 'jumps to', as we say - and that conclusion when supported by a sample carefully chosen to represent the community in question. Of course, a small sample - 60 people interviewed covertly in a short time by an officer who is not a specialist in the job and who has other important and tiring duties - does not provide conclusive evidence: nothing like it. But it does provide something much better than a conclusion which has been jumped to, a conclusion which happens to fit in with somebody's preconceived ideas which happens to reflect the state of a colonel's or staff captain's temper on a particular morning.

Even if the results of such a test are too scanty to have a numerical value assigned to them (as being nearer to or farther from the true picture of the situation) yet they can certainly provide evidence of the existence of various factors contributing in some measure to the local problem. And it may be that by attacking these factors, even if they aren't the most important causes of the trouble, one will do a lot towards winning over local goodwill. For the community will see that the administration, although perhaps blind to some issues, does see others and does tackle them. And administrations tend to be forgiven a lot if it is realised that they are doing something.

Probably there is no need to stress that in all Opinion Research work - except that which deals with very specific issues under already well known conditions - it is useless to look for complete accuracy or conclusiveness. Often the best... and most useful conclusion you can reach is the recommendation ‘This must be looked into further’ or ‘I can’t carry enquiries any further into this subject’ - with the implication that either a team of professional Opinion Research workers or an open Governmental enquiry is needed to get to the roots of the matter.

This last view is of course one which appeals to professional Opinion Researchers (who like their job) and to Civil Servants (who like passing the baby to someone else). But obviously I don’t recommend it as a general procedure.

I imagine that the conditions in which you are going to work will be pretty chaotic; that normal administrative facilities will be considerably impaired; and that much of the best work in the way of getting life moving - and moving reasonably smoothly and quickly - will result from decisions taken locally or recommendations made locally.

One last point. Whatever your recommendations - and whether they are made locally or sent back to some intelligence or administrative centre, the form and tone of the report you send will clearly affect their chances of success.

The standard military report can be adapted usefully as follows: Include under the title a brief indication of how and with what assistance you made the report, and on whose initiative it was made. Very likely it will have been made on your own initiative. If so, make quite explicit in Part I the limitations of your conclusions, and if necessary show the need for further investigation. On any significant point of detail mentioned in Part II, indicate the special means you employed to ascertain the truth.

Any schedules of questions and answers will naturally form an annexe. This should be prefaced by a statement of your reasons for carrying out your research among just these individuals, and for putting to them just these questions. Even if such an annexe does not receive close study, it will be evidence of the workmanlike character of your research, and this should help in gaining for it the attention it deserves.
